PREFACE.

MR. SHERIDAN and MR. WALKER are the only authors who have produced Pronouncing Dictionaries, previous to the present, which could be at all deemed complete; they having done what all preceding Orthoëpists omitted, namely, divided the words of the English language into syllables, and placed figures over the vowel characters, to distinguish the different sounds which they represent.

The present Dictionary contains Fifty-five thousand more words than either Mr. Sheridan's or Mr. Walker's, (in all upwards of ninety thousand); and by an improved system of notation, every letter represents a sound actually heard in Pronunciation, so that by merely committing a few rules to memory, even foreigners may acquire a perfect mastery in this department of our language. In addition to these Ninety thousand words I have given nearly twelve thousand Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper names, divided into syllables, with the sounds of the vowels, and the accents properly marked, making altogether above One Hundred Thousand Words—the largest number hitherto comprised in any similar volume.

I shall not say more of my own labours, or criticise those of my predecessors, but I consider it incumbent on me to state the circumstances which led to the publication of Mr. Walker's Dictionary; more especially as they are but little known.

Mr. Sheridan commenced his Dictionary in 1760; but did not publish it till 1780. He died at Margate, in Kent, in 1788, on his way to Lisbon for the recovery of his health, attended by his younger son, the late R. B. Sheridan, leaving his Dictionary in the hands of his younger daughter, and his Booksellers, and Publishers, Dilly in the Poultry, Dodsley in Pall Mall, and Wilkie in St. Paul's Church Yard, between whom differences arising, which could not be accommodated, the publication of the Dictionary was discontinued.

Mr. Walker was at that time a Teacher of Elocution in the Academies in and near London; and was encouraged by the Booksellers, whose names appear to the first edition of his Dictionary, published in 1791, to take Mr. Sheridan's work, and form another upon it. This he did, by merely copying it in the mass; carefully omitting the slightest notice of the masterly and complete developement of all the simple and compound elementary principles of Propunciation, the true nature of our Accent and Emphasis, and the Rules of English iv PREFACE.

Versification, &c., which precede the Dictionary, and substituting in their room "559 Rules, or Principles of Pronunciation," and, from them, deducing a key-line of the vowel sounds, which runs along the head of every page of his Dictionary, mixing up in it the only four diphthong sounds that he allows us, instead of twenty-five, and adding the two consonant sounds marked by th, taken from Mr. Sheridan, without acknowledgment, which key-line is exactly given by me in page 8, of my Principles of Pronunciation. Assuming also the office of a hypercritic over Sheridan, Kenrick, Elphinstone, Nares, Scott, Perry, &c., by picking out particular words, and agreeing with, or differing from some of those authors in the pronunciation; thereby indirectly intimating, that all these authors had produced Pronouncing Dictionaries.

Now, whoever will take the trouble of examining their works, as I have done, will perceive that no work like Mr. Sheridan's had been previously given as a Pronouncing Dictionary; and that the works of all those authors, except Kenrick's, are mere Pocket Grammars, giving, under the head of Orthoëpy, some correct, and some most absurd and incorrect lists of words, to exemplify the different sounds which the vowel characters, or letters represent; Kenrick, the most conspicuous, and Mr. Walker, following in the same track; not possessing ears acute enough to distinguish that, y and w, the touchstones of their mistakes, always represent vowel sounds, the former in every place in which it appears, in the beginning, the middle, and the end of words, the sound e, or the diphthong i, as in ye, lovely, by, bi; and the latter, invariably that of o in do: as oe, we; as how; as Louth and Sheridan have demonstrated.

The following specimen from Kenrick's Dictionary, who lays down sixteen different sounds of the vowels, and refers to them by figures, will show that he merely gives the words, first in their order undivided, with the accentual mark invariably placed over the vowel character of the syllable which he distinguishes as accented; and then, divides them into syllables, without any alteration, or addition; and, without marking the accented letter further than by figures placed over the vowels in each syllable.

A'dmiral—ad-mi-ral. Adju'st—ad-just.
A'djutant—ad-ju-tant. A'bbot—ab-bot.
A'bandon—a-ban-don. A'bdicate.

Mr. Perry, in his Dictionary, very judiciously taking a hint from Mr. Sheridan, makes the accent fall either on a consonant or vowel, instead of following the absurd practice of all the editors of Johnson, including Todd, of always placing the accentual mark over the vowel.

Now, though I cannot, at present, enter upon an examination in which I should be able to prove that Mr. Sheridan's Principles of Pronunciation are correct, and that, for one error which he has committed in practically marking the pronunciation of our words, Mr. Walker has committed two, I shall, in common justice to him, briefly point out the grounds upon which he was more particularly qualified to give a Fac-simile Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language. At the same time, I cannot help expressing my astonishment that, in representing the pronunciations to the eye, he did not exemplify the first of the four rules which he lays down in his Principles, and which, though it more immediately refers to words as represented to the eye in the spelling or writing of them, has an equal reference to the car in the pronunciation. The following are the rules:—

"When written words are considered as the types of sounds, in order to make them correspond to their archetypes, the four following rules should be strictly observed:—

- "1. No character should be set down in any word which is not pronounced.
- "2. Every distinct simple sound should have a distinct character to mark it, for which it should uniformly stand.
- "3. The same character should never be set down as the representative of two different sounds.
 - 4. All compound sounds should be marked only by such characters, as will naturally and necessarily produce those sounds, upon their being pronounced according to their names in the alphabet."

Mr. Sheridan was the third son of the Rev. Doctor Thomas Sheridan, of Quilca, in the County of Cavan, in Ireland, at whose house Dean Swift, young Sheridan's Godfather, spent a great deal of his time, and wrote his Gulliver's Travels; and, together with the father, took great pains with his Godson, in giving him instruction, till, at a very early age, his father sent him to Westminster School. In that seminary he formed friendships with the sons of several of the nobility, the Grenvilles, Percys, Lord Bute, and in particular with the Rev. Dr. Markham, afterwards Archbishop of York; Sheridan and Markham being accounted the two best scholars of their standing. Thence he was removed to the University of Dublin, in which he took his first degree of A.B., in 1736, and the degree of A.M. soon after. In November, 1758, he was, on account of his literary reputation, admitted in congregation to the degree of A.M. in the University of Cambridge; and, on the 16th of March, 1759, he was admitted to a similar distinction, in the sister University of Oxford. He gave Lectures on the English Language, and developed his principles of Pronunciation in both Universities, as well as in London, Dublin, and Edinburgh; and was honoured with the freedom of this last City, which was presented to him by Robertson, the historian. He was also the intimate friend of the Rev. Dr. Robert Sumner, Master of Harrow School; and of the Rev. Doctor Parr, who succeeded Sumner. In 1762, he published his scheme for a Pronouncing Dictionary, and in it developed the correct simple principles on which it should be founded; and in 1762, his late Majesty George the Third, on account of his literary reputation, granted him a Pension of two hundred a-year; the intelligence of which was communicated to him by his early friend and Patron, the Earl of Bute; to whom he suggested the propriety of a provision for Doctor Johnson; and was the first who communicated to Doctor Johnson the Royal intention. Both Pensions were given out of His Majesty's Privy Purse. In 1775, he published in London his Art of Reading Prose, and his Art of Reading Verse, in two volumes; both of which the compiler of this work read to him in 1776, and 1777, imbibing, from his instructions, that correct knowledge of the fundamental principles of the English language, which, being gifted with a good ear, has enabled him, after a lapse of so long a period, to fulfil his laborious and difficult undertaking.

JAMES KNOWLES.

DIRECTIONS TO FOREIGNERS,

HOW TO ACQUIRE A PERFECT KNOWLEDGE OF THE NINE VOWEL SOUNDS IN THEIR LONG AND SHORT QUANTITY, AND OF THE NINETEEN CONSONANT SOUNDS; THE FOUR COMPOUND

ARTICULATIONS, AND THE TABLE OF THE WHOLE ALPHABET; AND THE TABLE OF DIPHTHONGS; IN ORDER TO ASCERTAIN THE RIGHT PRONUNCIATION OF ALL ENGLISH LETTERS, SYLLABLES, AND WORDS; PARTLY EXTRACTED FROM MR. SHERIDAN'S WORKS, BY J. KNOWLES.

a'll, a'rt, a'ce, e've, no', to', bet', bit', but'-on', was', at'-good'-w, o-y, e, or i-i, u.

In the first place, they should be able to pronounce properly all the words and sounds in the key-line; which, in default of masters, they may easily learn to do, by hearing them from the mouth of any Englishman.

And it will be necessary to get the key-line by heart, so as to be able to repeat, and to exemplify, any one of the vowel sounds, separately, in any syllable of a word that presents itself to their eye.

As this is the master-key to the marks for the vowel sounds throughout, it will be necessary that all, who would know them at sight, should have the perfect use of it according to the above directions.

Foreigners should also be frequently exercised in the pronunciation of the consonant sounds, preceding them by any of the short vowel sounds, as the short sound represented by &—&m', &n', &p', &r', &s', &t', &t', &th', & a little time, when accented, by keeping the organs together, and which cannot be dwelt upon for the smallest space of time, because the organs must be instantly separated, in order to perfect the sound: the former, as eb', ed', eg', the latter as ek', ep', et', of the mutes; and showing that the sounds of the semivowels may be dwelt upon almost at pleasure, as, el, em, er, &c.

And in order to conquer the sounds of eth and eth, and other consonants, it will be good practice to follow follow in the key line: as, eth-\(^2\), et foreigners how they may acquire the use of such sounds in the English tongue as peculiarly belong to it, whether simple or compound; with which they were not preacquainted, and to which, as being novel to them, they find it difficult, and in some cases, for want of proper instruction, impossible, to give utterance. For which purpose I shall point out the difference between the French language and ours in that respect, as that is the most generally known and spoken by foreigners.

In the French tongue are to be found the sounds of all our vowels; but it is not so with regard to the consonants and diphthongs-

There are five of our consonants, which, though marked by two letters each, are in reality simple sounds; and these are th, th, sh, zh and ng; the first two to be found in the words thin and then, the last in ring, and the sound zh, ezh, in azure, osier.

The consonant th has two powers, according as it is formed by the voice, or the breath: the one may therefore be called vocal, the other aspirate. Of the former, there has been an example given in the word then; the power of the latter will be found in the word thin. To distinguish them from each other in the Dictionary, the latter, or aspirate, has a small line drawn across the h, thus th. As this sound has hitherto been found to be unconquerable by Frenchmen, and most foreigners, it will be necessary to show the cause of the difficulty, and then, by removing that, to point the means by which a right pronunciation of it may be easily attained.
It is to be observed, then, that in the French tongue, all the articulations are formed within the mouth, and the tongue is never protruded beyond the teeth; consequently, unless he is shown how to do it, the foreigner will never of himself place the organ in a position that it never had been in before; so that, when he is urged to pronounce that new sound, as in the word then, without having the position of the organs in forming that sound pointed out to him, he naturally utters the sound that is nearest to it in his own tongue, and, instead of then, says den, and for thin, tin; changing eth to a d, and eth to a t. And this he continues to do all his life, for want of being taught the following plain simplo method of necessarily producing those sounds, if it be but strictly followed. Suppose, then, you were desirous of showing a foreigner how he should form the sound eth when it begins a word or syllable; desire him to protrude the tip of his tongue between his teeth and a little beyond them; in that position let him press it again, the upper teeth without touching the under; then let him utter any voice with an intention of sounding the word then, drawing back the tongue at the same time behind his teeth, and the right sound will necessarily be produced. To pronounce the eth, or aspirated th, the organs must be exactly in the same position with the former; but previous to the withdrawing of the tongue, instead of voice, he must emit breath only, which will as necessarily produce the proper power of the aspirated th, as in the word thin.

When these sounds end a word, or syllable, as in the words breathe, breath, he must be told, that instantaneously after sounding the preceding letters, he is to finish the word by applying the tip of the tongue to the upper teeth, as before, and in sounding the word breathe, the voice is to be continued to the end; while in that of breath, the voice is cut off at the vowel, and the consonant th is formed by the breath only. both cases, it will be of use to continue the tongue in the same position for some time, prolonging the sound of the voice in the former, and of the breath in the latter, till the sounds become distinct and easy by practice. This will the more speedily be effected, if he will for some time every day repeat from a vocabulary all the words beginning with th, and form lists of such words as terminate with it.

As to the simple sound or consonant marked by the junction of the two letters ng, it is, perhaps, a sound peculiar to the English language, as in the word singsong; and seems to have been taken from the noise made by bells, mimicked in the expression of ding-dong bell. There is a sound in the French nearly approaching to it, to be found in such words as dent, camp, and in all their nasal vowels; but these are imperfect sounds, and can scarcely be called articulate; and there only wants to perfect the articulation to make the French exactly the same with the English: the only difference between them being, that, in the French similar sounds, the tongue does not touch the roof of the mouth, as in pronouncing the English ing, though in other respects it be in a similar position. If, therefore, a foreigner wants to produce this sound, he has only to raise the middle of his tongue into a gentle contact with the roof of his mouth in pronouncing any of the nasal vowels, which completes the articulation, and in this way the French nasal vowel heard in the word dent, will be converted into the English consonant sounded in the syllable dong; and so on of the rest.

This letter has a very different sound in English from what it has in French. In the latter it has a simple sound; in the former it is the representative of a compound sound made of d and an aspirated z. difficult sound to such foreigners as have it not in their several tongues: and to enable them to pronounce it, it is only requisite to desire them to form the letter d with a vowel before it, as ed; keeping the tongue in the same position that it has when that letter is so formed; then let them try to unite it to the French j, which is exactly the same sound with what I have called the aspirated z or zh, and the compound sound of edzh, or dzha, will be produced. But as foreigners are equally strangers to the combination of the two letters zh, and would therefore not know what sound belonged to it, it will be proper to substitute the French j in the room of zh in spelling all words containing that sound, as thus, edge; and in order to begin a syllable with that sound, which is more difficult than to conclude with it, let them place the tongue in the position of sounding ed, keeping it in that position, and then the first sound uttered must necessarily be that of d, which connected with the subsequent j followed by a vowel, of course must form the compound to be found in the words tjoy (joy), djoke (joke).
The sound of this letter has been sometimes marked

m the Dictionary by a combination of the letters dzh_j and sometimes by the letter j. But if a foreigner will consider the zh as equivalent to the French j, the right pronunciation will soon become familiar to him.

The sound annexed to this combination of letters is different in the English from what it is in the French : in the former it is a compound, in the latter a simple sound; in the same way as that of j, just described.
The sound of the French ch is exactly the same as the English sh; and, in order to facilitate the pronunciation of our compound ch, it will be only necessary to follow the same method as has been above proposed with regard to the letter j; with this difference, that a t instead of a d is to be formed in the manner there described, preceding the sound of the French ch, as, etch. It is true, we have some words in our tongue where the ch is preceded by a t, producing the same indivi-dual sound, as in the words itch, stitch, which the French never fail to pronounce properly, being guided to it by seeing the letter t placed before the ch; but to other words, of exactly the same sound, though differently spelt, by the omission of the t, as rich, which, they always annex their own simple sound of ch. So that here is a plain simple rule to guide foreigners in the right pronunciation of the English ch, which is, by always supposing combined letters preceded by a t; thus, in the words cheese, charm, let them suppose them spelt tcheese, tcharm; and if they find any difficulty at first in uniting those sounds at the beginning of words, on account of the eye's not being accustomed to such a combination of those letters, let them do as was before directed with regard to j; let them begin with placing the organs in the position of sounding t, which will be done by placing a vowel before it, as et; the t being thus formed, let them keep the tongue in that position: the sound of t must necessarily be the first uttered on changing that position, and will readily coalesce with the following sound of ch.

This compound sound, as above described, is what uniformly prevails in all native English words; but there are some few derived from the French which retain their primitive pronunciation, such as chagrin, champaign, chevalier, &c.; and some, derived from the Greek, take the sound of k, as chaos, chorus: bu the number of these is but small, easily learned by use and the difference is properly marked in the Dictionary

Sh.

This is a combination of letters not to be found in the French language, and therefore foreigners know not what sound to give it; but the usual way is to pronounce it like a simple s. Thus: for shal, they say sal; for shame, same, &c. But, to attain the right sound, it will be only necessary to inform them, that the English sh has uniformly the same sound as the French ch, in the words charité, chêre: thus, if they supppose the words shall and shame, above-mentioned, to be written, chall and chame, they will pronounce them properly.

Diphthongs.

Having said all that is necessary of the vowels and consonants, the next article to be considered is that o. the diphthongs. It is in these that the chief difference between the English and French tongues consists, as there are many diphthongs in the former not to be found in the latter.

Of the Diphthongs i and v.

These two have hitherto always passed for simple sounds, because they are for the most part marked by single letters as above: their sounds are marked in the scheme of the vowels, by the words fight, blue; and these are the sounds given to those vowels in repeating the alphabet. But in reality they are perfect diphthougs, and therefore foreigners can never attain their right pronunciation, till they are first made acquainted with the simple sounds whereof they are composed. The diphthong i is a compound of the fullest and slenderest of our vowels a and e; the first made by the largest, and the last by the smallest aperture of the mouth. If we attend to the process in forming this sound, we shall find that the mouth is first opened to the same degree of aperture, and is in the same position as if it were going to pronounce a, but before the voice can get a passage through the lips the under jaw is drawn near to the upper, in the same position as when the vowel e is formed; and thus the full sound, checked by the slender one, and coalescing with it, produces a third sound different from both, which is the diphthong i. There is a sound in the French somewhat resembling our i, to be found in such words as vin, fin; but that there is a difference between them, will be im-mediately perceptible by sounding after them our mediately perceptible by sounding after them our words, as vin, wine—fan, fine; and the difference consists in this, that their diphthong is formed of the second sound of a, a and e, and ours of the first, a e; so that, in order to produce that sound, you are to desire a foreigner to open his mouth as wide as if he were going to pronounce a, and meant to sound that vowel; but on the first effort of the voice for that purpose, to check its progress by a sudden motion of the under jaw towards progress by a sudden motion of the three in-the upper, till the two sounds coalesce, and then instantly to stop all further effusion of voice. Thus, as the sound of a is not completed, nor the sound of e continued, there results from the union of the two a third sound or diphthong, which has no resemblance to either and yet is a compound of both.

The diphthong u is compounded of the sound e and o, the former so rapidly uttered, and falling so quickly into the sound o, that its own power is not perceived, while that of o, being a little dwelt upon, is distinctly heard. There is a sound in the Franch that something There is a sound in the French that somewhat resembles this, to be found in the words dieu, mieux but the difference will be immediately perceived by sounding after them our words dew, mew; and it consists in this, that their diphthong terminates in the French vowel eu, a sound which we have not in our tongue, and is found therefore very hard to be formed by English organs; and ours terminates in ô, the same as the French ou. To form it properly, therefore, a for eigner is to be told that it is composed of the sounds ê and ô, the first not completed, but rapidly running into the latter, which he is to consider as the same sound with the French ou; our pronoun you is an exact representation to a French eye o our diphthong u.

DIRECTIONS TO FOREIGNERS.

Of the Diphthong oi, or oy.

This diphthong, which is sometimes spelt with an i, and sometimes with a y, is formed by a union of the same vowels as that of i: that is à ê, with this difference, that the first vowel à being dwelt upon, is distinctly heard before its sound is changed by its junction with the latter vowel ê, as in the words noise, ndês, boys, båêz, nå-êz, ndêz, bå-êz, båêz.

To form this diphthong, it is necessary to pronounce the full sound of a, dwelling a little upon it before the sound is intercepted by the motion of the under jaw, to the position of forming the slender sound ê, and then the voice is instantly to cease. This diphthong differs from that of i only in this, that the first vowel à is distinctly heard before it unites with the latter vowel ê.

Of the Diphthong ou, or ow.

This diphthong, though differently marked, like the foregoing one, sometimes by ou, and sometimes by ow, has always the same sound, and is composed of the vowels à and &; the organs being at first in the position of sounding a, but before that sound is perfected, by a motion of the under jaw and lips to the position of sounding o, the first sound a, is checked and blended with the latter &, from which results the diphthong ou or ow, as in thou, now, (thảôu, nàow.)

All the other diphthongs of our tongue are formed by the short sounds of ô and ê, marked by the characters w and y, preceding other vowels, and combining with them in the same syllable; as thus:

ya'rd va' w or short &. yå'wl waft! wa'11 wå/ge wê/ wed' yét' yê' yô/ke yô/utn ŷĕs' ŷîs' wit' yon' wi se wôt! wo'e wô'o young' ñ word' would'

To instruct foreigners in the true prenunciation of these, it will be only necessary to inform usem that our w answers in sound and power to the French ou, when it forms a diphthong. As, for instance, our pronoun we is individually the same sound as their affirmative oui : and the mistake which they constantly commit of sounding that letter like a v, is owing to their not being in-formed of the true nature of that letter, and taking up their idea of it from the printed character, wherein two interwoven vees (w) are exhibited to view; but if in all diphthongs commencing with that letter, they will place their lips in the position of forming the French ou, they cannot fail of producing the proper sound. In like manner, all diphthongs formed by y, are to be considered as commencing with the sound given to that character in the French, which is the same with their vowel i.

All who make themselves masters of the few directions and rules given above, will be enabled to produce at sight the right pronunciation of every word which they shall look for in the Dictionary.

The accent is placed throughout over the letter on which it is laid in pronunciation; over the vowel or diphthong, when the stress of the voice is on the vowel; over the consonant when it is on that. As thus :-

Accent over the Consonant. Accent over the Vowel. bê'r står/ låv/ hê'r båt/ grô'n låt'er so'shal.

The syllables of the words are divided according to the mode of pronouncing them; that is, all letters which are united in utterance in the same syllable, are kept together also in writing, and separated from the rest; which certainly is the natural division, though it be contrary to the fantastic mode followed in our spelling-books and grammars.

OBSERVED BY THE NATIVES OF IRELAND AND WALES,

IN ORDER TO ATTAIN A JUST PRONUNCIATION OF ENGLISH.

Extracted from Mr. Sheridan's Works, with some Alterations, by J. Knowles.

The chief mistakes made by the Irish in pronouncing English, lie for the most part in the sounds of the two first vowels, a and e; the former being generally sounded å by the Irish, as in the word bår, in most words where it is pronounced å, as in day, by the English. Thus, the Irish say, påtron, måtron, the vowel å having the same sound as in the word fåther; while the English pronounce them as if written, paytron, maytron. The following rule, strictly attended to, will rectify this mistake throughout the whole language. When the vowel a finishes asyllable, and has the ac-

When the vowel a finishes asyllable, and has the accent on it, it is invariably pronounced å [day] by the English. To this rule there are but three exceptions in the whole language, to be found in the words fåther, papå, mamå. The Irish may think also the word rather an exception, as well as father; and so it would appear in their manner of pronouncing it, rå-ther, laying the accent on the vowel a: but in the English pronunciation, the consonant th is taken into the first sullable, as thus rather wathly which makes the difference syllable; as thus, rath'èr, which makes the difference. Whenever a consonant follows the vowel a in the same syllable, and the accent is on the consonant, the vowel a has always its second sound, as hât', mân'; as also the same sound lengthened when it precedes the letter r, as fâ'r, bâ'r, though the accent be on the letter r, as likewise when it precedes lm, as bâ'lm, psâ'lm. The Irish, ignorant of this latter exception, pronounce all words of that structure as if they were written bawm, psâwm, quawm, cawm, &c. In the first sound of a, marked by different combinations of vowels, or consonants, such as au in Paul; aw, in law; all, in call; ald, in bald; alk, in talk, &c. the Irish make no mistake, except in that of lm, as before mentioned.

The second vowel e is, for the most part, sounded ee by the English, when the accent is upon it; whilst the Irish in most words give it the sound of second å, as in hate. This sound of ê [ee] is marked by different combinations of vowels, such as ea, ei, e final mute, ee, and ie. In the two last combinations of ee and ie, the Irish never mistake; such as meet, seem, field, believe, &e.; but in all others, they almost universally change the sound of ê into å. Thus, in the combination ea, they pronounce the words tea, sea, please, as if they were spelt tay, say, plays; instead of tee, see, pleese. The English constantly give this sound to ea, whenever the accent is on the e, except in the following words, great, a pear, a bear, to bear, to forbear, to swear, to tear, to wear. In all which the e is sounded as in there, there. For want of knowing these exceptions, the gentlemen of Ireland, after some time of residence in London, are apt to fall into the general rule, and pronounce these words as if spelt greet, beer, sweer, &c.

Ei is always sounded ee by the English, and as å by the Irish: thus, the words deceit, receive, are pronounced by them as if written desate, resave. Ei is always sounded ee, except when a g follows it, as in the words, reign, feign, deign, &c.; as also in the words, rein (of a bridle), rein deer, vein, drein, veil, heir, which are pronounced like rain, vain, drain, vail, air.

The final mute e makes the preceding e in the same syllable, when accented, have the sound of ee, as in the words suprême, sincère, replête. This rule is almost universally broken through by the Irish, who pronounce all such words as if written suprâme, sinsåre, replâte, &c. There are but two exceptions to this rule in the English pronunciation, which are the words, there, where, &c.

In the way of marking this sound, e, by a double e, as thus, ee, as the Irish never make any mistakes, the best method for all who want to acquire the right pronunciation of these several combinations, is to suppose that ea, ei, and e, attended by a final mute e, are all spelt with a double e, or ee.

Ey is always sounded like å by the English, when the accent is upon it; as in the words prey, convey, pronounced pray, convay. To this there are but two exceptions, in the words key and ley, sounded kee, lee. The Irish, in attempting to pronounce like the English, often give the same sound to ey, as usually belongs to ei. thus, for prey, convey, they say pree, convee. A strict observation of these few rules, with a due

A strict observation of these few rules, with a due attention to the very few exceptions enumerated above, will enable the well-educated natives of Ireland to pronounce their words exactly in the same way as the more polished part of the inhabitants of England do, so far as the vowels are concerned. The diphthongs they commit no fault in, except in the sound of r; which has been already taken notice of in the Grammar. Where likewise the only difference in pronouncing any of the consonants has been pointed out; which is the thickening the sounds of d and t, in certain situations; and an easy method proposed of correcting this habit.

In order to complete the whole, I shall now give a list of such detached words, that do not come under any of the above rules, as are pronounced differently in Ireland from what they are in England.

These, after the closest attention, are all the words not included in the rules before laid down, that I have been able to collect, in which the well-educated natives of Ireland differ from those of England.

With regard to the natives of SCOTLAND-as their dialect differs more, and in a great number of points, from the English, than that of any others who speak that language, it will require a greater number of rules, and more pains to correct it. The most material difgerence in point of pronunciation, and which pervades their whole speech, is that of always laying the accent on the vowel, in words where it ought to be on the consonant. This has been already taken notice of in the Grammar, and the method of curing that habit pointed out. In this article, therefore, they should chiefly exercise themselves, till they attain a facility in accenting the consonants, and giving their true sounds to the preeding vowels, according to the rule there laid down; for it is in this that the chief difference between the Scotch and English pronunciation consists. With regard to intonation, indeed, or what is commonly called the Scotch accent, they totally differ from the English; of which I have treated at large in my Lectures on the Ar: of Reading. But in this, written rules can be of ittle use, except when assisted by the living voice; and therefore the aid of masters, who shall join example to precept, is here required. If the same ardour continues for obtaining a just and polished delivery, which I found preva's among the young gentlemen of Scotland, when I delivered my Course of Lectures at Edinburgh, they will now have it in their power to compass the point upon certain grounds, chiefly by their own labour and Nor will they long be without due assistapplication. ance, where that is requisite, upon proper encouragement; for as there could be no hopes of having skilful masters to teach this art, without first having a proper method of instruction; so that method being now laid open, will no doubt induce numbers to apply themselves to the mastery of it, in order to become preceptors in that most useful and ornamental of all arts.

Nor are there wanting examples to stimulate those who are in pursuit of this object, and to insure success to their endeavours. There was a gentleman of that country, in London, in a high office of the law, who did not leave Scotland till after he had been some years advanced in manhood; and yet, after having received instruction for a few months only, according to the method laid down in this work, his speech was not to be distinguished from that of the most polished natives of England, both in point of pronunciation and intonation; and he became at that day the best pattern to be followed with regard to both, whether in the House of Commons, or at the bar.

And yet there was a more extraordinary instance which I met with at Edinburgh, in a Lord* of Session, who, though he had never been out of Scotland, yet merely by his own pains, without rule or method, only conversing much with such Englishmen as happened to be there, and reading regularly with some of the principal actors, arrived even at an accuracy of pronunciation, and had not the least tincture of the Scottish intonation.

I shall now say a few words to the inhabitants of Wales; in order to show how easily they might get rid of their provincial dialect.

The peculiarity of the Welsh pronunciation arises chiefly from their constantly substituting the three pure mutes, in the room of the three impure; and the three aspirated semivowels, in the place of the three vocal. Thus, instead of b, they use p; for g, they use k, or hard c; and for d, they employ t. For blood, they say plut; for God, they say Cot; and for dear, tear. In like manner, in the use of the semivowels, they substitute f in the place of v; s in the place of z; eth in the room of eth; and esh in that of esh. Thus, instead of virtue and vice, they say, firtue and fice; instead of virtue and vice, they say, seal praises; instead of these and those, theses and those; instead of azure, osier, they say, shur, oshur. Thus, there are no less than seven of our consonants which the Welsh never pronounce at all. Now, if the difference in the manner of formation between these seven consonants and their seven correspondent ones, were pointed out to them, in the way described in the grammar, they might in a short time be taught the perfect use of them.

The people of Somersetshire pronounce the semivowels in a way directly opposite to that of the Welsh. For whereas the Welsh change the vocal into the aspirate, they of Somersetshire change the aspirate into the vocal. For father, they say, vather; for Somersetshire, Zomerzetshire; for thin, thin. So that their methon of cure, is to take the direct opposite course to that or the Welsh.

Anatomical and Logical Exposition

PRINCIPLES ON WHICH HUMAN SPEECH IS FOUNDED.

BEFORE I proceed to give a complete development of the nature, the number, and the properties of all the simple and compound sounds of the English language, I think it necessary to give the following philosophical and practical statement of the fundamental principles of human speech, as applicable to all languages.

OF HUMAN SPEECH.

"The power of speech," that is, of articulate speech, as the medium of human thoughts, "is a faculty peculiar to man; and was bestowed on him, by his beneficent Creator, for the greatest and most excellent uses; but, alas! how often do we pervert it to the worst of purposes?"—Louth's Grammar, p. 17.

"Thou man alone canst speak. Wonder at thy glorious prerogative, and pay to Him who gave it thee rational and welcome praise; teaching thy children wisdom—instructing the offspring of thy loins in piety."

-Economy of Human Life.

In the following reflections and attempts at an accurate exposition of the above subject, the origin, nature, and powers of vocal speech are anatomically and philosophically considered, with respect to all languages, and practically applied to the English language, in a development and examination of all its simple and compound articulations, vowels, consonants, and diphthongsnature, formation, properties, and number, as characteristically different from each other, and as forming syllables and words.

Of the Mind, Intellect, or Understanding; or, in other words, of the Brain of Man, and its various Passive and Active Powers, as the Sources of Speech or Language.

By a physical knowledge of the human mind, philosophers, metaphysicians, and logicians mean a knowledge of its essence: that is, a knowledge of the particular motions of the animal spirits, as proceeding from the heart and operating on the brain, on which thinking depends; and, whether the formation of our ideas depends upon matter or not.

Now, this is a knowledge possessed only by the Creator, which will, most probably, be for ever hidden from man, in this his earthly state of existence. The Supreme Being, however, having, in his wisdom and goodness, created man not only as a sentient, but, a thinking being, and a free agent, endowed him also with the powers of consciousness, reflection, and reasoning, to enable him to distinguish right from wrong, in thinking, speaking, and acting, under the pure guidance of his revealed will, word, and ordinances; and not under the headstrong influence of his own sinfu, rorrupt, and selfish imaginations,-which have become so through the disobedience of our first parents, and their consequent fall from the original purity of heart and mind with which God endowed them.

But, a knowledge of the mere animal nature, substance, and susceptibilities of the brain of man, the perceptions and powers of which, under the constant influence of his will, his desires, and passions, and the emotions of his heart, constitute what is called his mind; a knowledge also that the brain receives the first impressions, called ideas, from all the external objects that present themselves to his senses, and an additional knowledge that, the ideas so received operate on one another, and are commingled so as to produce a second set of ideas, which, together with the first, form, by the help of words, as their signs, what is called language; all these have been, with great approaches to accuracy, ascertained and developed by anecomists, logicians, philosophers, and grammarians, as the only apparent sources on which thinking, and the formation of man's ideas depend; and as the apparent boundaries beyond which his Creator has ordained he should not pass in his researches to discover any other co-existing causes on which they may also partly depend.

The orthoepist, or grammarian, is not called upon to describe the texture of the brain, or the cavities which contain it, but simply to state, that, anatomists say the brain of man is more voluminous than that of almost every other animal, and that the quantity or dimensions of it are proportioned to the size of the head, and generally in direct proportion to the capacity or comprehensiveness of the mind, or understanding; and that, a man eminently distinguished for the extent and power of his mental faculties is almost invariably found to have a large head. From these discoveries and observations of anatomists, however accurate they may be, it is not to be taken for a fact, that every man having a large head is necessarily a man of superior mental capacity, genius, or talents in one way or another; for, there are many causes of an augmentation of the size of the head, beside the size or quantity of the brain; and it may be observed here, that, the only way of estimating the vo lume of the brain in any living person is, to measure the dimensions of the skull.

God has been pleased, in his mercy and goodness, to endow many of his other creatures beside man with a social disposition; and all with a natural language of tones, looks, and gestures, suited to their everal wants and feelings, and to their different spheres of action and utility.

But, man, whom he ordained to have dominion over all the other creatures, and to walk erect upon the earth, and exercise his power in mercy over them all, he not only endowed with a social disposition, and a natural language of tones, looks, and gestures, but, also, with the power of forming an artificial language, to be used, not merely as the common means of social union, and moral happiness, in his intercourse with his fellow men, but, as the great instrument by the use of which he was to hold communion with his Creator, by prayer and thanksgiving; and also draw forth, cultivate, and bring into action, all the nobler powers of his nature, and the pure emotions of his heart, and keep in subjection to these, all the merely animal feelings, appetites, and passions, which he possesses in common with the brutes. Man, therefore, has his mouth, and the various organs connected with it, so fashioned by his Creator as to render them capable of forming, with the greatest nicety of distinction, a great variety of artien-late sounds, which constitute spoken language, of which written language is the type.

But, the peculiar fitness of man's organs to form a certain number and variety of articulate sounds was not of itself sufficient to produce language, for, parrots and other birds have been taught to utter articulate sounds and whole sentences, distinctly enough, though utterly debarred, by the will of their Divine Creator, from encroaching on the prerogative of man, by attaching meaning to them; so true it is, as Buffon says, that "no disposition" (rather formation), "of matter, but that which the Creator has willed, can give mind.

To the complete formation of language, it was therefore necessary that man should be able to use certain articulate sounds, called words, agreed upon by a kind of tacit compact, the result of imitation in different countries, as signs of all the perceptions received into his mind; that is, received by his brain, from all external objects, through the medium of his five senses, which are seeing, hearing, tasting, feeling, and smelling.

Under these fundamental sources of spoken language, the first process was, to call each impression made on the brain by the external objects which the senses perceive, an idea, thought, or notion. The second, to call all the articulate sounds, whether simple or compound, which are made use of in speaking, or, by their marks in writing, as the signs of those thoughts, ideas, or notions, words; as being the media, the instruments, by which whatever passes in the heart and mind of one man, is conveyed to the hearts and minds of his fellow men, accompanied by tones, looks, and gestures, as expressive of the feelings, emotions, and passions, which are generated by those ideas.

The second process necessary to the construction of language was, that words should be made use of not only as signs of the impressions which the mind receives from all external objects through the medium of the senses, called in grammar, ideas, &c.; but also, that, they should be made use of as signs of the ideas generated in the mind or brain itself, by the various operations of those first ideas upon one another, in the acts which are called thinking, recollecting, willing, reasoning, &c.; by which operation, another class of ideas are generated or formed, called ideas of reflection; so that sensation and reflection are the only sources of all our thoughts or ideas.

In the third place, neither were the uses of words to stand as symbols of single thoughts, derived externally from the senses; or formed internally by the operations of those first thoughts upon one another, sufficient to make words as extensively useful as they ought to be; for, it is not enough for the perfection of language that words can be made use of as the signs of single thoughts; they must be made use of as comprehending under one complex, or general term, several individual ideas of persons, places, and things, &c. of the same genus, or species; for, the multiplication of words, each of which was to be used as the sign or name of only one place, person, or thing, action, emotion, passion, event, &c. spoken of, would have perplexed the use of words, and been found an impossible attempt. To remedy, therefore, this inconvenience, language, whether spoken or written, had yet a farther improve-ment to make, in the use and adoption of general, or complex terms; whereby one word is used to mark, or include under it, as a common name, a number, or class, or multitude of particular persons, things, places, &c.; that is, of individual existences. This necessary, and advantageous use of words, is obtained by using one word as the sign or name of a whole class or species of persons, places, things, &c.; as man, cow, palace, artichoke, rose; or, as the sign or name of several species or classes, as animal, building, vegetable, flower, &c., such words being properly called complex, or general terms; for, as Horne Tooke observes on Mr. Locke's use of the term "complex idea," throughout his "Essay on the Human Understanding," there is no such thing in nature as a complex idea.

Again, for the sake of brevity or despatch in discourse, language required still farther improvements. It required that one word should be made use of frequently to convey the meaning of several dissimilar ideas, as constituting a whole phrase or sentence, which had been expressed in a preceding part of a discourse, or, or several sentences or paragraphs, &c. For examples of all these methods used for the sake of despatch, the curious reader is referred to Mr. Locke's "Essay on the Human Understanding," and to Horne Tooke's ' Diversions of Purley."

These few preliminary observations lead us to a practical consideration of the general uses of speech, and a more particular elucidation of the principal powers and actions of the brain, or mind, and exertions of the will. which are employed in the formation of language.

SECTION II.

OF THE POWERS, PASSIVE AND ACTIVE, OF THE HUMAN BRAIN, AND THE IMPRESSIONS MADE ON IT, WHICH ALTOGETHER FORM WHAT IS CALLED THE MIND, IN-TELLECT, OR UNDERSTANDING.

Independently of considering man as a social, religious, and moral being, accountable to his Maker the use which he makes of all the wonderful faculties and privileges with which he has endowed him, one of the most remarkable distinctions between him and the brute species is, that, whilst all the faculties of brutes grow up with them without any assistance from man, all the nobler faculties of man require pains to unfold, direct, and carry them to perfection; for, though formed for social life, he would neither be capable of recognizing the proper subjects of discourse, nor of discoursing consistently, nor to any distinct purpose, if he were not endowed, in a pre-eminent degree, with many faculties which brutes either want entirely, or possess only in a very limited degree.

Of these faculties the following are the principal :-First, sensation; or, a capability in the brain of receiving, through the medium of the senses, a distinct, though not always an indelible impression, from every person, place, or thing, action, quality, essence, motion, &c. &c., that can in any way become an object of the senses; which power is called perception, or sensation, the brain of man, when he is born, being, like a sheet of white paper, void of any impressions; that is, he is not born with innate impressions, innate ideas of persons, places, or things of any kind; sensation, therefore, is our first observation employed about external perceptible things, objects, &c.; and we receive the ideas of sensation from the impressions made on our organs of sense by external sensible objects; as a man, a tall man, a flower, a yellow flower, a stone, a hard stone, a cry, a lond cry, an apple, a sour apple, a weed, an offensive weed, &c. Sensation is thus the first source or inlet of our ideas; of all knowledge, merely

Secondly, reflection; which is our observation exercised about the internal operation of our ideas, passive and active; is the second power of the brain or mind. It is the power which enables us to view, over and over again, the first impressions made on the brain by all external objects, through the medium of the senses, and examine them as we would the features of our face in a glass; and combine and exercise them so as, out of their various operations, to form new internal ideas, which, on account of their being so formed, are called ideas of reflection; so that, the whole stock of our ideas become ranked under the two general heads, or classes, of ideas of sensation, and ideas of reflection.

"We receive the ideas of reflection," says Locke, "from the operations of our ideas in thinking, which operations, when the mind perceives them, furnishes those ideas of reflection. Examples of reflection are the operations of doubting, reasoning, willing." Reflection is called by Locke an internal sense, from its resemblance in its powers to sensation; for, as sensation imparts ideas to the brain, from the impressions made on the senses by all external objects; reflection also generates other ideas, from all the ideas that are impressed on the brain in both these ways.

From the preceding observations and definitions, we draw the following conclusions; that sensation, strictly so called, is always employed about external objects; reflection, about internal.

In any particular instance, a sensation means an impression made on some part of the body, and noticed by the brain. In this sense, and in other respects, the brain is passive; for no man can refuse to perceive ideas of objects presented to him; nor be ignorant of what he does when he thinks.

The brain, like a mirror, is forced to receive impressions, just as external objects make them; and like it, cannot refuse to receive, cannot alter, cannot obliterate, any impression made on it by any object presented to it, though disease may, as it were, in spite of our wishes to retain them, totally efface some of the impressions which it has received.

Whatever is perceived in any way, externally, or internally, is called an object.

The stock of our ideas is increased by reflection, experience, and composition. Perception is frequently called thinking; but, thinking is not a proper term for this faculty; because, thinking implies action; but, in perception the brain is passive.

From various causes, the brain, or mind, does not always notice the impressions made on the senses by external objects; hence, two things are necessary to the existence of any idea in the mind; these are sensation and perception; for, perception is the inlet to all our knowledge; and it is absolutely necessary to perception that the brain should take notice of all the impressions made on the senses by all external objects.

Memory, or retention, is the third power of the brain, or mind; and, consists in storing up, and retaining in the mind, the simple ideas of sensation and reflection; and the complex, or general terms, which are the signs for whole classes of individual ideas, each bearing some common resemblance to all the rest. Locke calls me-mory the storehouse of the mind, the storehouse of our ideas; thus attaching to it a passive, and an active signification. He says there are two kinds of retention, contemplation and memory. The former, he says, is keeping an idea for some time actually in view. latter is, the power of reviving in the mind ideas that had disappeared, after having been imprinted on it; but, this latter power of retention, or memory, ought rather to be called recollection, or reminiscence.

Memory depends very much on the constitution of our bodies. Its business is to furnish to the mind dormant ideas when occasion requires.

Memory differs from simple perception by the additional perception annexed to ideas of memory; viz.,

that we had them before.

Mr. Locke, from whose Essay the greater part of these definitions are taken, calls memory a second perception, from the notice which it takes of ideas, and says that, it is sometimes active, and sometimes passive; active, when it sets itself to work in searching out an idea, which employment he calls turning, as it were, the eye of the soul on its ideas; passive, when ideas, of their own accord, appear in the mind.

Recollection, or reminiscence, is the fourth power of the brain, or mind, and is the power of recalling, or bringing back, or perhaps more properly bringing out from the storehouse of the brain, after they had been used and laid by, and forgetten for a time, impressions which it had received some time before.

Discerning, is the fifth faculty of the brain, or mind, and is the power of distinguishing between ideas in the mind. It prevents confusion among our ideas, and on it depend the evidence and certainty of a great many general propositions. The mind gets the idea of the operation of discerning by reflection.

Exactness of judgment, and clearness of reasoning, are obtained by clearness of discerning.

Comparing ideas with one another, says Locke, is another faculty of the mind; and the ideas that depend on this faculty are all comprehended under relation. This power, says he, extends only to general propositions, used in abstract reasonings. He does not mention this power as one of the four acts which constitute the power called reason, though the words which he uses in marking its force; viz., that "it extends only to general propositions," sufficiently denote that it does not apply to mere simple ideas of sensation and reflection, and to complex or general terms, of which only he has treated in his Essay. I have, therefore, included comparison under the term reason, as one of the four exercises which constitute this faculty.

Reason is the sixth power of the brain or mind. consists in examining, arranging, combining, and com-paring our ideas of persons, places, and things of all kinds, as presented to the mind, and impressed upon it by the senses; and all those which are generated in the mind by reflection on the various operations of those first simple ideas, combined and acting upon one another, and on the mind itself; and also in arranging, examining, combining, and comparing the complex terms under which many classes of ideas, as expressing genus and species, are included, those complex terms or words, as including several individuals, being called common names; the logical, or grammatical distinctions of names being, that every word, or general term, that is a name for several classes, as the word animal, is called a common name expressing genus; every word that is the name of only one class, as man, is called a common name expressing species; and every word which is the name of only one of a class, as London, is called an individual, or proper name.

Imagination, or fancy, is the seventh power of the mind, a power arising out of the exercise of reflection, and often unconsciously exercised, even in sleep, in a wonderful manner. It consists in forming in our waking hours, pictures, or resemblances of persons, places, and things of all kinds already known, when not present to the senses; or, in creating out of them beings of its own, bearing some strange resemblances to known beings; of examining their nature, properties, and essences; of reviewing the actions performed, or said to be performed by them; and of making them pass before the mind, either in their natural forms, under the guidance of nature, truth, reason, and revelation; or, in grotesque, disorderly, and discordant forms, uncontrolled by nature, truth, reason, and revelation, and under the sole guidance of falsehood, the passions, and

In a discourse, annexed to the first volume of his "Art of Reading," published in London about the year 1774; Mr. Sheridan has given so just and striking a description of this faculty, that I trust my readers will not be displeased at my presenting them with the whole of what he says of it.

"Man is a compound being. He is the link between spiritual and animal existence; and partakes of both their natures: but, he has also something peculiar to himself. His intellectual faculties, prove his alliance to a superior class of beings. His sensual appetites and passions, show his affinity to brutes: but, it is in the powers of the imagination, that we are to seek for his own peculiar, or human nature, as distinguishing him from the brute species, on the one hand, and the purely spiritual, on the other.

"As reason, presides over the intellectual; passion, over the sensitive; so fancy, governs this part of the human frame. And, of all the faculties belonging to man, this seems to be the most constant in its operations; and the most extensive in its influence. The power of the most extensive in its influence. fancy over ideas of sensation, and reflection, is unbounded. She creates beings of her own; and, so great is her influence, that beings of her creation often make deeper impressions on the minds of men, than such as have a real existence. She excites, modifies, and directs the passions of man, at her will. Not only his sports and pleasures, but, even his more serious pursuits in life, are too frequently under her direction. The history of every nation in the world, will furnish out innumerable instances, of her unbounded influence, over the most important concerns of man, in religion, government, laws, morals, philosophy, and the arts. And her present despotic power, which she exercises over most articles in life, cannot better be described or explained, than by the single term, fashion.

"Nor shall we wonder at the mighty influence of fancy, when we consider that, this faculty never ceases to act. When the intellect is weary of its labours, and and demands rest; when the sensual appetites and passions are sated, and dormant; fancy still continues for ever on the wing; for ever unwearied in her pursuits. Nay, in sleep itself, when every other faculty is locked up, she asserts her empire over the human mind, and frolics there at large, in all the wild luxuriance of dreams.

"From this view of her power, we may see that, though she may be an excellent ally to reason; yet, if she does not acknowledge his superiority; and is not content with a state of subordination to his orders; she may either strengthen the animal part of man's nature; or, set up an independent power of her own, superior to both. Let us consider her in these three lights. As an ally to reason, she partakes of the divine nature of the soul; and has the whole store of intellectual ideas at command. She takes her flight with a bold wing through infinity, uncircumscribed by space or time; reason, her chief and guide, all the while aiding and directing her course. In this employment, she adds pleasure to the operations of the intellect, and adorns science, so as always to make it delightful. Thus, she produces a fund of pleasure far superior to those of the sensual kind; and, of course, obtains an ascendant over the animal faculties; and draws them after her into a due subordination of the intellectual. Such were the effects produced by the cultivation of the nobler arts, in ancient Grecce and Rome.

"As an ally to the passions, I mean of the sensual kind, she is confined with them to crawl the earth. abject state she soon becomes a slave to the passions; and her exertions in this employment, serve only to degrade men below beasts. This depraved condition of man, has been largely set forth, in the history of the Epicurean sect, in that of the Sybarites, the Capuans, It is to be feared, too, that examples and modern Italy. of this sort, are not wanting in our own country.

"When she sets up for herself, and acknowledges no superior, her vigorous and wild sallies through unknown regions, without guide or director, are either vain and fruitless, as has been seen in the vast variety of systems in speculative philosophy, which have been produced in different ages and countries in the world, by the wild imaginations of men; or else, they have been productive of the worst disorders in human affairs, when exerted about the practical duties of life, in religion, politics, and morals. Her efforts here serve only to pervert man from the great end of his being; to rob him of all his animal, as well as rational enjoyments, in order to substitute her own visionary ones in their room, and, often to change his nature, and incline him to that, which we are told belongs to spirits reprobate. Such, we know, have been the effects at all times, of extravagant enthusiasm, and wild superstition.
"When we look into the history of the world, we shall find that fancy has been but seldom employed in her most glorious sphere, that of assisting human nature in its progress towards perfection; on the contrary, her chief office has been, to debase, or pervert mankind. The reason of which is, that this part of the human frame, has, in most nations of the world, been wholly neglected and left to chance. There has been care neglected and left to chance. taken in many, even to excess, to improve the intellectual powers; by which, numbers have spent their lives, fruitlessly, in abstract speculations; and useless, often impenetrable metaphysics. Lawgivers and magistrates have endeavoured to restrain the passions most dangerous to society, within proper bounds, by penal laws. Moralists and philosophers have tried to prevail on men to do their duty, by showing them what it is; while the imagination left to itself, unguided and unrestrained, laughs at their vain attempts; and shows itself paramount to all the dictates of reason, to all laws, divine and human."

Judgment is the eighth power of the mind. It is the power of discerning, by the aid of all the preceding ones, the various relations which subsist between all the propositions advanced in the course of a discourse or argument; their agreement, or disagreement; their truth, or falsehood, and their exact bearing on the subject of discourse; and of deducing clear and consistent conclusions from the whole.

These are the principal sources of all our ideas, and the principal powers by which they are regulated and governed; but, Mr. Locke has enumerated others, as, composition, enlarging, naming, abstraction, &c. He thus defines composition, as a separate act :- " Composition consists in putting together the ideas received from sensation and reflection, in order to form complex ideas, and also successions of propositions or sentences."

He should have said, complex, or general terms.

"Enlarging is, putting ideas of the same kind together; as, for instance, putting together a number of units to make a dozen. It may be ranked under the head of composition; but, the composition of ideas in enlarging is not so apparent as in simple composition; because it does not extend to such a number of ideas.

"Naming is the act of making words the signs of our ideas, and is another faculty of the mind.'

Abstraction is another faculty of the mind, which consists in considering ideas as they are in the mindas separate existences; and, from the impossibility of giving every single idea a name peculiar to itself, arises the necessity of including several under one head, or name, from some common resemblance which belongs to them all; and so forming abstract ideas, as they are called, or complex general terms; such as, being, creature, animal, beast, reptile, man, woman, whiteness, blackness, &c.

Thus we see, that, though the brain of man is originally without any ideas-any impressions of outward objects, and that, it gradually receives its first class of ideas, called ideas of perception, through the medium of the senses; yet that, after the mind has been stored with a number of those ideas, it soon begins to exercise them in the various ways before mentioned, so as to generate within itself a new class of ideas, called ideas of reflection, and to advert in a variety of ways to their individual and collective influence on itself, and on the minds of others; thus forming, by the help of words, as their signs, a language of ideas.

From the premises thus laid down, the following conclusions are drawn :-

First,-that, so far as mere ideas are to be considered, by the mind is to be understood the whole body of ideas with which it is stored by the senses and by reflection, and by all their operations, and by whatever means, and in whatever way those operations are produced.

Secondly,—that, oral language, as the type of ideas, is the result, partly of man's social affection, and partly of the powers which have been described.

Thirdly,—that language is the principal medium and instrument by, and through which, all the nobler faculties of man are cultivated, and brought to perfection; and that, those inquiries which have for their object to show how the speech of any nation, or any division thereof, may be naturally resolved into its first constituent simple principles, and all its combined powers developed, must be considered, not only as interesting, but useful and liberal in a high degree.

SECTION III.

Having thus endeavoured to enumerate and describe the principal powers of the brain, or mind, as employed in the formation of speech, I should now pass on to a developement of the rules of grammar in general, or philosophical grammar, and more particularly to the application of those rules to the English language; but such a developement forms no part of my present work, as not promised in my prospectus. I shall, therefore, merely make a few observations on orthocpy, the first division of the rules of grammar in general, and give an outline of the particular principles and rules by which the dictionary which I present to the public is distin-guished from every other pronouncing dictionary; and refer the reader, for further and more particular in-formation as to the simple and compound sounds of the English language, and the true nature of our accent and emphasis, to the matter which precedes Mr. Sheridan's and Mr. Walker's dictionaries; the whole of whose rules will precede this dictionary, and thus be laid before the public in general, but more particularly teachers, in order to enable them to form a just estimate of the respective merits of these gentlemen.

Of Oral Speech in General.

All the rules of grammar are properly classed under five heads:—orthoepy, orthography, etymology, syntax, and prosody; but, in all modern grammars, orthoepy is ans prosony; but, in all modern grammars, orthoepy is entirely omitted; and, contrary to reason, the natural distinction between speech and writing, and the very derivation of the word orthography, from ogelos, orthos, right; and γ2αφω, grapho, to write; it is very gravely said, that "Orthography treats of the sound of letters, syllables, and words, and the right manner of spelling words," Now, this is a manifest mistake for the life. Now, this is a manifest mistake, for, it is well known that the ancients, who never made use of any term without applying it to a specific use, made use of, and included under the term orthocpy, as its derivation rom ogfos, right, and reos, epos, a sound, imports, all he rules that are laid down for the pronunciation of ietters, syllables, and words.

Of the Organs which produce the Voice.

The breath, or air from the lungs, is changed into the ciear, distinct, audible sound called voice, by strong exertions of the lungs, and the whole cavity of the chest, throat, and mouth, and in particular made capable of answering the purposes of speech, by certain organs which lie at the top of the windpipe.

The trachea, or windpipe, is that tube which conveys air into and from the lungs, and consists of cartilages, or gristles, so strong as to enable it to stand firm and uncompressed.

The top of the windpipe consists of four cartilages, which altogether form what is called the larynx; and the epiglottis forms a fifth cartilage belonging to the wind-

The epiglottis is a broad triangular cartilage, very elastic, and like to an artichoke leaf. It has a powerful influence upon speech; but, its peculiar office is to defend the aperture or opening of the windpipe into the mouth; which opening is called the glottis; and to prevent anything from falling down into the windpipe by this passage. In this respect the epiglettis acts like a valve, standing directly over the glottis, and flaps down apon it, like the key of a wind instrument, the motion of the tongue instinctively laying it flat over the glottis, so that it is a perfect guard upon the aperture of the trachea.

The air, or mere breath from the lungs, is formed into voice by the movements of the larynx, and by the vibrating action of the membranes which line it, but, more particularly by two very fine semicircular mem-pranes which are attached to the sides of the upper cartilages of the larynx. The space between these two membranes forms, and is called, the glottis; and the action, the expansions, and contractions of these membranes, are performed with an accuracy and minuteness so exquisitely nice, that, for every change of note in singing, they are contracted, or expanded, in a proportioned degree, every contraction, or expansion, producing a different note. The space, or distance between these membranes, is not greater than about the eighth of an inch; and is, naturally, greater in men, than in boys and women; in consequence of which, the voices of men are naturally deeper, or graver, than those of women and ooys; and the voices of women and boys higher, or more acute, than those of men. Touch or press forcibly with your finger the upper part of your windpipe, when you are drawing your breath backwards and forwards, or, when you are articulating any of the aspirated consonants, as es, esh, eth, ef, and you will not perceive the slightest movement of the upper part of the windpipe, because that, by an effort of your will, you do not make your breath act upon the larynx and glottis, and you are uttering breath only. Utter any of the vowels, as å in all, å in art, å in ace, by themselves, or any of the consonants, as eb', ed', eg', and press forcibly the very upper part of your windpipe with your finger whilst uttering those sounds, and you will perceive that your windpipe resists, swells out, and presses strongly against your finger, because that, by an unconscious, merely mechanical effort, you are making the mere air or breath from your lungs act upon the larynx and glottis, which convert it into the clear sound called voice.

SECTION IV.

OF THE ORGANS OF SPEECH AND ARTICULATION.

1. The voice being produced as we have described, and fitted for the purpose of articulation and speech, is formed into the first simple, or primary articulations, called, in all languages, vowels and consonants; and into diphthongs, syllables, and words, by the peculiar organs called the organs of speech.

These organs are the uvula, the arched cavity of the mouth, the tongue, the palate, the lips, the teeth, the gums, and the nose, all of which are put in motion, or made to produce different contacts, and acted upon by the voice, in order to produce the different simple and compound sounds of speech.

3. Of these organs there is only one which requires to be particularly described, and that is, the uvula; which has a very powerful influence, not merely on articulation, but on the voice itself. The uvula is that round soft body, or tongue, which is suspended from the extreme back of the palate, or roof of the mouth, over the glottis, or opening of the windpipe. It is an extremely delicate and flexible organ; of the existence, or situation owhich, few persons, except surgeons and physicians, can be aware, unless they have happened to discover and remark it, on looking into the mouth of a person complaining of having a sore throat.

When I held the office of head master of the English department in the Belfast Academical Institution, into which I was unanimously elected, and which I held from the opening of it, in 1814, till the government grant of £1500 a year was withdrawn in 1817, I had a young gentleman under my care as a boarder, whose whole speech was most disagreeably obscured by his having, as it appeared to me, a double uvula, in consequence of which he forced all his words through his nose. But, a surgeon, to whom I since mentioned the circumstance, assured me, that, what I considered as a double organ, assured me, that, what I considered as a double organ, was only a separation of the uvula, in the nature of a hare lip; and that the parts could have been united by sewing them together, which perhaps might have removed the difficulty that prevented me from totally reforming his speech. It is very remarkable that his parents were not aware of the circumstance, otherwise a surgeon would have remedied the natural irregularity of the organ.

4. The tongue is called the principal organ of speech; because, it is either brought to a contact with some other organ, or, it is more or less raised, or depressed, contracted, or expanded, and placed in a particular position, in producing every sound. In short, it is very much like a wave of the sea, which is perpetually undulating.

SECTION V.

OF ARTICULATION IN LANGUAGE, AND PARTICULARLY OF THE FUNDAMENTAL, OR PRIMARY ARTICULA-TIONS, OUT OF WHICH THE WORDS OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE ARE FORMED.

 Articulation, in language, is the forming of the human voice, accompanied by the breath, in some few consonants, into the simple and compound sounds, called vowels, consonants, and diphthongs, by the assistance of the organs of speech; and the uniting of those vowels, consonants, and diphthongs together, so as to form syllables and words, and constitute spoken language.

2. The definition, therefore, of a simple, articulate sound must, in all languages, be, that it is the sound of the human voice, formed by a mere opening of the mouth, without any contact of the organs of speech; or, by an opening of the mouth, and a contact of two or more of the organs of speech, the tongue, the lips, the teeth, the gums, the palate, the roof of the mouth, and the nose.

3. The first, and most simple articulations, in all languages, are the former, which are formed by one impulse, or stroke of the voice, and one opening of the mouth, to give that impulse a form and passage, without any particular movement or contact of the organs, to intercept the voice. This species of artic organs, to all languages, called a vowel; and in the English lan-guage it is so called from the French word voyelle, derived from the Latin word vocalis.

The definition of a vowel, therefore, is, that it is a simple, that is, a single articulate sound, formed by one impulse, or stroke, of the voice, and one opening of the mouth in a particular manner, to give the voice a passage and form, without any contact of the organs of sage and form, without any contact of the organs of speech. This will be plainly perceived, by sounding, by themselves, the following long vowels, as heard in the words all, art, ace, eve, ore, do; as å, å, å, ê, ô, ô. The figures placed over the above vowels have referred to the result of the r ence to the scale of the vowels which will presently be exhibited.

5. The next articulations called simple, though, in fact, they are really compound sounds, are the consonants, which are formed by different contacts of the organs of speech; but, as no contact of any of the organs can, by itself, produce an articulate sound, every movement and contact must be assisted by an impulse, or stroke of the voice, which, by its action on the organs, gives them the power of producing a sound, which is called a consonant sound, at the same time that the impulse, or stroke of the voice, assumes the form of some particular vowel, at the will of the speaker, and according to the degree in which the mouth is opened, activities to give the two sounds thus united a passage; as ab, ap, am, ad, at, al, ak, &c. or ba, pa, ma, da, ta, la, ka, making the vowel sound either precede or follow the contact of the organs.

2. The definition of a consonant, therefore, is, that it is a compound articulate sound, formed by the action of a vowel or diphthong on some of the organs of speech, when brought to a contact, which vowel, or diphthong, striking on the organs of speech as it passes through the mouth, gives them the power of producing a sound, which mixes itself with the vowel or diphthong sound, and is inseparable from it, and which is called a consonant, from the Latin word consonans, sounding with, or together, because it sounds, or is heard, in conjunction with the vowel or diphthong.

3. In uttering a consonant, therefore, we hear two sounds, but two sounds which cannot be divided into two separate articulations; for, take away the vowel or diphthong from the whole sound produced by its action on the organs which are brought together to produce the consonant, and the consonant can no more have existence than the wheel of a mill can have motion, if you remove the water or any other power which moves it. Thus, b, p, m, are formed by three different contacts of the same organs of speech, the lips, preceded or followed by some vowel sound, as ab, ap, am, or ba, pa, ma. But it is evident that, though the b, p, and m are produced by bringing the lips to a contact, the lips receive the power of producing these consonants from the action of the vowel upon them, as it passes between them, at the instant of their separation; and that, if the lips were brought together a thousand times, unassisted by a vocal sound acting on them, they would not produce those

4. Finally, with respect to a vowel and consonant sound, in every language it is to be observed, that,

Ist, In uttering a vowel, the ear must hear only one simple sound, and that sound must consist of only one impulse or stroke of the voice, passing through an one mouth, more or less, without any contact of the organs of speech to intercept it.

2. That, whether the vowel be a full or a slender one, a long or a short, depends, partly upon the impetus given to the voice, partly upon the manner in which, by an effort of our will, the voice is made to act upon the larynx and glottis, and partly upon the degree in which the mouth is opened to give it a passage; by which it becomes more or less full, as it is made to ad-vance along the palate, and strike on the extreme back part of it, or nearer towards the teeth.

3. In uttering a consonant, two united simultaneous sounds must be heard, the one that of a pure vowel or diphthong, preceding a contact of two or more of the organs of speech, or following it, in the instant of separating the organs; the other that of a co-existing sound produced by the action of a vowel or diphthong upon two or more of the organs when brought to a contact, but inseparable from the vowel or diphthong, inasmuch as no contact of the organs can of itself produce a consonant, and to complete every consonant a separation of the organs is absolutely necessary, as the sound cannot be perfected as long as they are kept together.

Concluding Observations on the Formation of the Vowels.

In examining Mr. Sheridan's principles, it will be seen that he has, with considerable accuracy, described the manner in which the vowel sounds are formed; but, if any teacher, any critic, wishes to be more particular, let him look into a child's mouth whilst he is repeating them deliberately, or place himself before a magnifying glass, and look into his own mouth, and I venture to assert that he will draw the following conclusion as to the precise manner in which each of them is produced, proceeding from the sound of a, in all, to that represented by u, in but.

à'll, à'ıt, à'ce, ê've, ô're, tô', bet, bit, bût.
à à å ê ô ô ēh' ih' ûh'

à à à è ô ô èh' sh' th'
Instead of t, I have placed an h after the three short vowels, which are, in their very nature, incapable of prolongation, to show that, in the attempt to utter them by themselves without a consonant following them, the aspiration h follows the vowel, and connects itself with it.

In sounding & he will perceive that the mouth, that is, the jaws, are opened wider than in sounding a; that the tongue is drawn back towards the opening of the glottis, leaving a considerable cavity, or space, between it and the roof of the mouth, or palate; and that the impulse, or stroke of the voice, is directed against the back part of the palate, near the passage through which the voice issues: that in sounding a the tongue is much advanced towards the teeth, and raised up considerably towards the palate, leaving a less space between it and the tongue; in consequence of which the stroke of the voice is less full, and more advanced along the palate. In sounding å, he will perceive that the tongue is swelled up, and raised towards the palate, and spread out on both sides; by which means a small space is left between it and the palate, and the sound consequently becomes less full than the preceding two, and the stroke of the voice is more advanced towards the teeth. In sounding ê, he will find that the jaws are almost closed, so that he cannot see the back part of the tongue, whereas in sounding à and å he can see as far back as the uvula and the opening of the glottis; that the tongue is swelled, or raised up, and thickened as it were, so as to block up considerably the space between it and the palate, and to direct the stroke of the voice nearer to the teeth, and render the sound of the voice still less full than that of a. In sounding ô, he will perceive that he team that of a ... In soluting o, the win perceive that he can see far back into the mouth; that the point of the tongue is thickened, and turned down on the palate of the underjaw; and that, along the tongue, which is drawn back, a groove is formed, by the swelling up of the tongue an each side toward the width part for from the tongue on each side, toward the middle, not far from the edges of it, over which the voice passes; at the same time that the under lip is raised up and pushed out, and the upper corresponding with it, they conjointly form a groove corresponding with that formed by the tongue, the cavity within the mouth being so great as to render the sound a full one, notwithstanding that the mouth is so much closed by the pushing out of the lips. In sounding ô, he will find that the position of the tongue, and the groove in the middle of it, over which the voice passes, are exactly the same, but that the sides of both lips are brought closer together, and pointed, and pushed out more than in sounding ô, in consequence of which, in forming the sound, he cannot see so fully into his mouth as he can in sounding ô. In both he will perceive that the voice, which has passed along the groove formed by the tongue, acts strongly on the lips as it passes between them. In uttering the sounds arbitrarily marked by e, i, u, in et', it', ut', he will perceive that the sound represented by e in et, is produced by a movement of the larynx and glottis, which throws out a short and quick percussion of the voice upon the tongue and palate, which is directed towards the front of the mouth; that the extremity of the tongue is pointed strongly down to the lower palate, or gums; that it is considerably raised in the mouth, but not drawn back; and the it rises towards the back part, so as to receive the impuse of the voice, and throw it forward, as I have said. In uttering the sound represented by i, in it, he will perceive that the position of the tongue is the same as in the former sound; but that, the tengue raises itself more, and throws the sound up to the roof of the mouth. In uttering the sound represented by s in ut, he will perceive that the end, or point of 'b' tongue, is looser in the mouth than it was in the for ner sounds, and drawn a little farther back from the lower gums, though it rests upon the lower palate; that it is drawn back so much as to leave a considerable space between it and the palate; and that, by a strong movement, it raises the back part of it up, so as to throw the voice against the extreme back part and sides of the palate. I have dwelt the more particularly upon the nature of these three short sounds, because, neither Mr. Sheridan, nor any other orthoepist, or grammarian, has, in the slightest degree, described them farther than as the tirce short sounds, which are "incapable of prolonga-tion."—See Mr. Sheridan's Principles of Pronunciat on.

TABLE, OR SCHEME OF THE WHOLE ALPHABET.

Number of simple vowel and consonant sounds in our tongue, twenty-eight, and one pure aspiration h, making in all twenty-nine.

9 Vowels, a å ô all art ace eve no do ell ill 6 Of these are long, that is, they can be prolonged at pleasure; viz. å, å, å, å, ê, ô, ô, all, art, ace, eve, no, do.

3 In their nature absolutely short, so that they cannot be at all prolonged, or sounded by themselves, &, i, u; in ell, ill, us.

19 Consonants, eb, ed, ef, eg, ek, el, em, en, ep, er, es, et, ev, ez, eth, eth, esh, ezh, ing.

2 Superfluous, c, which has only the power of k, or s, as in card, cell.
2 Compound, j, which stands for ezh, preceded by d, as edzh, as in James; x, standing for ks, or gz, as in excel, exact.

1 No letter, as is usually said, h, being merely a mark of aspiration.

Consonants divided into Mutes and Semivowels.

6 Mutes, eb, ed, eg, ek, ep, et.

3 Pure mutes, ek, ep, et, whose sounds cannot be prolonged.

3 Impure mutes, eb, ed, eg, whose sounds can be prolonged a little.

13 Semivowels, ef, el, em, en, er, es, ev, ez, eth, eth, esh, ezh, ing; so called to distinguish them from the mutes; because their sounds may be prolonged for some time, like those of the long vowels.

5 Pure vocal semivowels, el, em, en, er, ing, sounded entirely by the voice. 4 Impure semivowels, ev, ez, eth, ezh, formed by a mixture of breath with the voice. 4 Aspirated, ef, es, eth, esh, formed entirely by the breath.

Divided again in labial, dental, palatine, nasal, according to the parts of the mouth, and the organs by which they are formed, and whether the voice passes through the lips or the nose.

3 Labial, eb, ep, em, formed entirely by the lips. 2 Labio-dental, ef, ev, formed by the under lip, and the upper teeth.

2 Dental, eth, eth, formed by placing the tip of the tongue between the teeth.

12 Palatine, ed, et, es, ez, esh, ezh, eg, ek, el, en, er, ing, formed by an application of different parts of the tongue to different parts of the palate, from the upper gums to the roof of the mouth.

3 Nasal, em, en, ing, so called because their sounds are made to pass through the nose, and not through the lips.

SECTION VII.

OF DIPHTHONGS AND THE DEFINITION.

A diphthong, or compound vowel, as it is called, but which should rather be called a compound vocal articulation, is the union of two or more vowels in one articulation, or syllable, and is produced by pronouncing the one so instantaneously after the other, that the former flows into, or unites with the latter, so as to form a third compound articulation, or syllable, as wa, in the word water; wa, in the word waxen; wa, in wafer; wê, in the pronoun we, &c. &c.; ŷâ, in the word yawn; ŷâ, in yard; ŷê, in year; êô, in yoke, &c. &c. Here follows a list, or table, of all the diphthongs and triphthongs in our language, with the different vowel characters which mark their sounds; of which diphthong sounds no two are alike; that is, though the vowel characters which represent them be similar or very different from each other, yet each diphthong differs from every other in the table, as not being, in the individual vowel sounds which are heard in its pronunciation, composed of the same two long vowel sounds, the same two short vowel sounds, the same .ong vowel sound followed by a short, or the same short vowel sound followed by a long vowel sound. The same diphthong is sometimes represented by two vowel characters, sometimes by three, as in ye, year, yield: womb woo; queen; we, weep, weave; ware, wear, &c.

There are twenty-five diphthongs, and three triphthongs, represented mostly by the following vowel characters, as running through the syllables of our lan-guage, and altogether amounting, in the repetition of them, to upwards of twenty thousand.

SECTION VIII.

OBSERVATIONS ON ARTICULATION, WITH REFERENCE TO THE SIMPLE SOUNDS OF SPEECH.

1. My first observation is, that, as the definition of an articulate sound is, that it is the sound of the human voice, formed by the organs of speech; it may be objected against those consonants which are formed entirely by the breath, as ef, es, eth, esh, that they cannot be called articulate sounds. Now, this objection would be correct and conclusive, if it could be shown that, a consonant sound could be completed without the assistance of a vowel, and that the mere breath, acting upon any movement, or contact of the organs, would be sufficient to enable them to perfect the consonant for the purposes of speech; but, if we observe the process of articulation, in forming any of the aspirated consonants, keeping our organs for a long time in the position of forming these hissing, serpent, or goose-like sounds, which we may do as long as we please, we shall find, that, though the consonant is in itself entirely sounded by the action of the mere breath upon the organs, whilst they are in contact, yet it cannot be completed into an articulation, fit for the purposes of speech, until some vowel is made to precede, or follow, and unite itself with the contact of the organs, by its being thrown, as it were, upon them, in the very act of bringing them together, or made to follow, in the very act of separating them.

2. For instance, I shall take the aspirated consonant eth, as in theme, path, as sufficient to exemplify my observations.

Now, if I place my tongue between my teeth, and keep it in that position for a long time, making my breath only act upon these organs, without the previous utterance of any vowel on the instant of throwing them into that position; or, if I withdraw my tongue, without an actual utterance of some vowel in doing so, I cannot complete the aspiration th, any more than a goose can; but, if I make any vowel either precede or follow the contact, so as to unite with the aspiration, I then complete the aspiration, and it becomes a perfect consonant articulation-consonans, that is, sounding with the or tha, tha, tha, the, tho, &c., &c., theme, path.

My second observation, which will exemplify in a very striking manner, the characteristic difference between a vowel and a consonant, is, that, though in making the breath act upon the organs, whilst in the position necessary to produce the aspirated semivowels, f, s, th, sh, an actual incipient, but incomplete degree of sound is heard, yet the case is not the same with respect to the mutes or the rest of the semivowels. On the contrary, the action of bringing and keeping the organs together, without the assistance of a vowel, produces absolute silence; for, let any person place his organs in the positions necessary to produce b, p, m, n, t, k, d, ng, &c., and keep them together for some time, without uttering, or letting his voice pass, to form a vowel sound, as persons do who stutter; or, let him utter any vowel sound previously to bringing his organs together, and, instead of separating them to perfect the consonant, let him compress and keep them together, not separating the organs to form a vowel, and he will find that a total absence of articulation must be the consequence.

4. My third observation is, that, as, in forming the vowels, there is a palpable movement of the mouth and tongue, though there is no actual contact of any of the organs, and, as four of the semivowels, cs, ez, esh, ezh, are produced by movements and contacts of the tongue, which are not so palpable as those necessary to produce the other consonants; it may be questioned whether there be any sensible and absolute difference between these four and the vowels. To this I answer, that these consonants are formed chiefly by the action of the breath on the organs whilst they are forming; that they cannot be perfected without the distinct assistance of some vowel, preceding or following the action of the organs; and that, in uttering them, we hear two sounds united; whereas every person's ear and organs must be sensible of the fact, that, in uttering any of the vowels, he hears only one articulation; that, in uttering a consonant, he hears two; and that nothing can be more evident than this, that a vowel has a positive existence without the aid of any consonant, but a consonant can have no existence without the aid of a vowel.

5. My fourth and last observation is, that, as h is a very efficient, expressive, and powerful assistant in all languages, so much so that it cannot be dispensed with, and is to be found in a variety of combinations, it may be asked how it can with propriety be said, in all languages, that it is not a letter; and, as ef, es, eth, and esh, are formed entirely by the breath, it may also be asked upon what ground they can be called articulate sounds. To these questions I answer, that, as the defi-nition of an articulate is, "the sound of the human voice, formed by the organs of speech," the character h being merely the mark of an aspiration, or breathing, without the least mixture of the voice, or contact of the rgans, it cannot have any claim to be called an articulate sound; and that, with respect to ef, es, eth, and esh, though, in forming them, the breath only, without any mixture of the voice, continues to act upon the organs as long as they are kept in the positions necessary to produce these sounds, and no longer; yet that, unless a vowel sound precede or follow the several contacts, the consonants cannot be completed.

I have dwelt the longer on this part of my subject which has reference to the characteristic difference between a vowel and a consonant in all languages, because it is evident that, the farther our writers on grammar have advanced in their cultivation of the language, in other respects, the greater and more palpable is the ignorance which they have shown upon this point; and because I consider that it would be the height of presumption in me, to charge such a present authority as Mr. Walker, and every other modern orthoepist, except Dr. Louth and Mr. Sheridan, with ignorance upon a subject apparently so simple, were I not certain that I should be able to prove that the lines which I have drawn are correct.

OF THE PRINCIPAL IMPROVEMENTS IN THIS DICTIONARY.

The principal improvements in this Dictionary are-1st. The following key line, which exhibits the nine simple vowel sounds of the English language, of which no two are characteristically the same, with the short quantity of the only three which admit of a short quantity, and with the sounds always represented by the vowel characters, w, y, i, u, will be continued throughout the Dictionary, as the head line of every page.

My Key Line of the Vowel Sounds, long and short and of the Vowel Characters, w, y, i, u.

å'll, å'rt, å'ce, ê've, nô', tô', bět', bît', bůt'—òn', ŵås'; åt'; gồod'; ŵ, ô; ŷ, ê, or i; i, u.

2nd. The following is the key or foot line of the simple consonant sounds, in all 19 and 1 pure aspiration; h, to run across the bottom of the first page only with the superfluous and compound letters, and their sounds; 2 superfluous, c, k, or s; q, k; 3 compound, j, ej; x, eks, or egz; ch, etsh. For the reason why a short yowl sound should precede each contact of the organs, I refer to Mr. Sheridan's "Principles," preceding this work :-

eb', ed', ef', eg', ek', el', em', en', ep', er', es', et', ev', ez' eth', eth', esh', ezh', ing', c, k or s; q, k; j, ej; x, eks, or egz; ch, etsh; h, an aspiration, eh, ha.

3d. Contrasted with these, Mr. Walker's head-line, which runs across every page of his dictionary—Mr. Sheridan gives no head-line—will follow it in the second and third pages only :-

559. Fàte 73, får 77, fåll 83, fåt 81—mè 93, mèt 95— pine 105, pin 107—nò 162, mòve 164, nòr 167, nò, 163—tàbe 171, tāb 172, båll 173—ðil 229—pöänd 313—thin 466, this 469.

In this line, the reader will perceive, by only pro-nouncing the words given as examples, that Mr. Walker gives the mere short quantity of the same individual vowel as a characteristically different vowel; that he allows the language only four diphthongs as running through the whole body of our syl'ables, namely, i, in pine, u, in tube, &i, in oil, and &u, in pound; of which number any car, upon sounding the word oil, will instantly perceive that in this word, as in boy, coy, toy, both vowels are long, and that, though he has correctly marked the o, as representing the same full sound as a, in fall, he proves the incapacity of his ear to distinguish with exactness the difference between one sound and another, as marked by different vocal characters, in different words, or syllables; for the other vowel, i, does not represent the absolutely short sound denoted by i, in pin, but the sound of ê, in mê; the diphthong being truly åê, δi, as he should have marked it; for it would be impossible to give the i the same sound in oil, boy, tôý, côý, as that which it represents in pin. Suppose that, instead of pin, he had given the preposition in as his example of the sound which i represents in this word, and had placed the same figure of 2 over the i, to denote the peculiar sound which he intended to point out, surely no car, after pronouncing pin and in, would acknowledge that it heard the sound of è, in mè, in either word; or, suppose he had given the word coin, as his example of the diphthong, marking the i by the figure of 2, to signify that it has the same sound as in pin, surely any man whose ear was capable of distinquishing one sound from another, would immediately perceive that, in order to preserve the short sound marked by 1, he must make two syllables of the word, and pronounce it cå-ln; or pronounce the word as one syllable, and give to the o the sound of å, in fåll, and to the i the sound of è, in mè, còin, còin, or as two, thus,

To this key line of vowel and diphthong sounds, he adds two words, thin, this, which contain the two Saxon consonant sounds, arbitrarily marked by th, by our first grammarians, just as if there were a peculiar necessity for adding these two only, and not the other three, sh, zh, ng, esh, ezh, ing, which are not to be found in the Latin language, and consequently to represent which no consonant characters are to be found in the Roman alphabet, as adopted by our first grammarians, in the place of the Saxon, to represent our simple sounds. Now the reader will perceive that these five single consonant sounds, as Mr. Sheridan has shown, are each produced by one single contact of the organs which produce them, as simple as those which produce b, p, m; and the reason why they are marked by two letters is, that, as the Romans had no such consonant sounds, there were consequently no characters in the Roman alphabet to mark them; and our grammarians, instead of forming five distinct characters to represent them, fell upon the expedient of marking only three of them by two letters, eth, the Greek & theta, by joining t and h together; esh, by joining ans to h, sh; and ing, by adding an n to g, ng; leaving eth and ezh, as in then, azure, ozier, to shift for themselves, the former to be also represented by th, and the latter sometimes by z, sometimes by s, as in the words just given, azure, osier.

4th. My key line of the vowels contains the exact number of vowel sounds of the English language, of which no two are characteristically the same. are given to the number of nine-See Mr. Sheridan's "Principles;"-each, in its order, in a kind of articulate scale, as issuing from the larynx and glottis, and, from them, striking on, and proceeding along the palate, or roof of the mouth, from the hollow or back part of the mouth, in sounding à in all, the fullest vocal sound in any language, to the front, near the teeth, in sounding e, in eve, the slenderest vocal articulate sound in any anguage, and terminating in the pushing out of the ips in ô, in the word no, to ô, in the word to, the last of the first six of the line, which may be called long, or doubtful vowels, in point of quantity; because that, compared with the last three, marked by e, i, u, in bet, bit, but, their quantity, when accented, is long, when unaccented, short; whereas e, i, u, are incapable of being sounded by themselves without an aspiration following them in the attempt to do so, as when we say, eh', ih', uh'; and are therefore absolutely short, and require a consonant accented to follow them, as in het, bit', but'; der', dir', dur', though all consonant accented syllables, as esh', ish', ush',; eng', ing', ung'; and, therefore, have no comparative quantity.

4th. That the three duplicates, or short sounds, à, in was', à, in at', and ô, in good', are never distinguished in the dictionary by the mark of short quantity placed over them, as I have shown them in the key line, because that, as they are never heard except when they precede consonant, as in the words just given, with the accent upon that consonant, it is impossible to mistake their quantity; and they must be short, as it would be impossible to distinguish the consonant by an accent, or smart stroke of the voice, without passing quickly over the vowel or diphthong which precedes it in the same syllable, and reducing the vowel or diphthong to a short quantity. Accordingly, it will be perceived, that the sound a which is accented, and therefore pronounced fully, and dwelt on, in all; or, capable of being dwelt on, is reduced to a short quantity in was, because the consonant, s, is accented; and the two vowels forming a diphthong are rapidly passed over, in order to accent the consonant. The d, in on, is also the same characteristic sound as å, in all, differing only in quantity, in concequence of the accent being on the n: the å, in at, differs only in quantity from the å, in aft; the sound of å, in göod, and of å, in bull, and bush, differ only in quantity, not sound, from δ , in $t\delta'$, $d\delta'$, or prove, by the accent being on the consonant in the former—on the vowel in the latter. These duplicates, therefore, throughout the dictionary, are always marked by the figures that are placed over their correlative long sounds, the consonant which follows them showing that they are sounded short. Another reason for not always placing the mark of long or short quantity over the long or short vowels, in addition to the figures, is, that the type would take up too much space, and make the lines appear very unsightly.

7th. The vowel sound δ , in $n\delta'$, $g\delta'$; the vowel sound δ , in δ' ce, pa'ce; and the vowel sound δ , in δ' ce, whether accented and prolonged, or not, are always the same, and can scarcely be said to have a short quantity; so that three of the long vowels, δ , δ , δ , as in δ' l, δ' rt, δ' , have a short quantity in δ' as', δ' t', $g\delta$ od': the other three, δ , δ , δ , have not a short quantity.

8th. That the sound of the letter w, in every syllable and word in which it appears in the writing of words, whether in the beginning, middle, or ending, representing exactly the same sound as that of \(\delta\), in t\(\delta\)', whether it be sounded long or short, will always be represented by the vowel \(\delta\), being always a vowel.

by the vowel & being always a vowel.

9th. That the letter u, in diphthongs, representing exactly the same sound as w, in wit, will, like w, be represented by &; for, take the words wit', wick', quit', quick', and remove the q from the latter two, and you will instantly perceive that the w, the u, and the vowel o, in to, represent exactly the same sound in the diphthongs wi and ui, as wit', wick', uit', uick', &ît', &îk'. The u, therefore, like w, when used in forming diphthongs, will be represented by &.

10th. That as the letter y always represents the sound

10th. That as the letter y always represents the sound ê, or i; ê in the beginning of every word, ye', yo'u, yet', young', êê, êô, êêt', êûng'; and frequently in the ending, as in lovely, lûv'-lê; when so sounded, its sound will be invariably represented by the figure 4 over the y; and when it is sounded i, as in try, by the letter i and a dot placed over it, as tri.

11th. When the letters i and u, as named in the alphabet, are so sounded, as diphthongs, but not accented, as in contrite, destitute, and in all syllables in which they precede e not sounded, I distinguish the sounds thus, de's'-té-tu't, kôn-tri't, with the accentual mark; the ê in trite, as in all words of one syllable ending in e, as in late, mate, rate, grate, rite, prate, and tute, being left out, as not sounded, the vowels in such terminating syllables being long, as a't, e't, i't, o't, u't; and also to distinguish more strikingly the diphthong sound of the i and u, in such syllables, from the correlative, short, simple vowel sounds, of which these letters are often the marks, as in bit, bât. And, whenever the i and u are accented, I merely place the accentual mark over them, as in di'ce, du'ce, di's, du's. But in all syllables in which i and u retain their full sounds, unaccented, I do not place any mark over them, as thus, rêf'-lu-ênt, kô-âg'-u-lât', rêk'-tê-fi-êr, rêk'-u-zânt, êd'-ê-fi.

12th. That, as the letters o, in on', and a, in was', both represent the short quantity of å, in all, I am not particular in marking these short sounds in diphthongs by a only, or by b; but sometimes by one, sometimes by the other, as in was', ôoz', watch, ôatsh, quantity, quality, kôôn'-tît-ê, kôàl'-it-ê.

13th. That, when a diphthong occurs in a syllable, the diphthong, and not the following consonant, is often the accented sound, as in foul, oil, boil, bound; fåöll, ååël, båöld; and I mark the diphthong by placing the accent after the latter vowel, as åël. But, when the following consonant, and not the diphthong, is accented, as in was', watch', öåz', öötsh', I mark the consonant; both the vowels, and the whole syllable, or word, being short. I here repeat what I have already laid down, that three of the six vowel sounds, å, å, ö, have a short quantity, when the accent is upon a following consonant, as in wås', növ', åv', göod', pūll', būl'; the vowel character å, as in was, almost invariably representing the short quantity of å, as böl', pöl', föl', döl', &c., to z and ng, in löng', and the vowel character u sometimes representing the short quantity of å. But I defy any, the nicest car, to prove that the other three long vowel sounds, å, ĉ, ĉ, have any short quantity; though their sounds, when they are accented, may be prolonged at pleasure; and I also defy any person to take the sound è, as preceding any consonant from b to z, and to squeeze it, Mr. Walker's term in speaking of ee, or shorten it, nto the peculiar sound which i represents in ib', if', it', iz', ing'; differing characteristically from each of the other eight, whether sounded long or short, or whether the following consonant be accented or not.

14th. That the sounds of the consonants, and of the superfluous, and compound letters, follow the vowels at the bottom of the first page only, with a short vowel sound preceding each, in order to enable the student, or foreigner, to make accurate observations on the manner in which the organs of speech are brought tegether to form them; and the nice distinctions between them; in consequence of the slight differences which the different contacts of the very same organs occasion, as in b, p, m, accordingly as they are more or less compressed, or as a greater or less portion of them is brought to-gether; or as they may be kept in contact for some time, to prolong the articulations, as in eb', ed', eg'; or must be instantly separated, as in ep', ek', et'; in which atter three, the attempt to keep the organs together for the smallest space of time would only prevent a com-pletion of the articulations. Or, again, as in eth, in theme, and eth, in then, the nice distinction between these two sounds, the contact of the tongue placed between the teeth, resting on the under, and pressing slightly against the under part of the upper, the breath only acting on the organs in the former eth, and the breath and voice united, with a closer pressure of the congue against the teeth, acting on the latter, and constituting the nice characteristic difference between them—eth, eth.—See Mr. Sheridan's "Principles," and observe that throughout every syllable in the dictionary they will be distinguished from each other as they are here.

15th. I have to observe, that the sound ng, ing, does not commence more than two or three words in our language; as inguinal, ingle, pronounced ing-guin-al, ing'gl; and that zh, ezh, does not commence a single word, as it does in a number of French words, as jardine, jamais, jambe, jarre, jambaje, &c.; but, that it commences, as well as ends, many syllables, supplying the place of s; as in the words adhesion, cohesion, treasure, measure, pronounced ad-he-zhun, ko-he-zhun,

16th. Throughout the dictionary, instead of dzh, which Mr. Sheridan makes use of, as the compound sound of which soft g and j are composed, and their representatives, that is, the sound of d united to zh, dzh, edzh, I make use of j, as Mr. Walker sometimes correctly and judiciously does. But, whereas he places d before the j in many words, I give the j singly, as a perfect mark for the full compound sound; the sound of d before j, ir any one syllable in the language, not being heard by any ear, though Mr. Walker's led him to suppose it could be heard preceding j in the very same syllable, as in grudje, judje, lodje, trudje, &c.; thus, in several instances, constituting his eye, not his ear, the judge of sounds, and in this very word, judge, fol-lowing the spelling, and taking it for granted that it with zh, ezh, in the pronunciation of g, because the d precedes the g in the spelling. I give Mr. Sheridan's, Mr. Walker's, and my pronunciation of the following words, dredge, drudge, grudge, judge, ledge, trudge, as tollow:—M. Sheridan, dredzh', drudzh', grudzh', dzhudzh', lodzh, trudzh'; correct; but the dzh has an uncouth annesentae though he precede a precedent and the control of the cont uncouth appearance, though he properly omits the e, as not being sounded. My pronunciation, drej', druj', gruj', juj', loj', truj'. Mr. Walker, dredje, drudje, grudje, judje, lodje, trudje: three errors; first, the d not sounded; second, the e not sounded; third, no letter marked as the accented sound; an omission remarkable throughout his dictionary, not a single word of one syllable being marked with an accent, though, in fact, even the smallest words have an accented letter -no'haso'; to'haso'; if'hasf'; in'hasn'. In fine, I defy any critic, any teacher, in England, Scotland, or Ireland, to prove that I have advanced, in these assertions and observations, a single one that is incorrect; and I close them with an expression of my astonishment that, it did not occur to Mr. Sheridan, that, in order to form a correct pronouncing dictionary of the English language, that should be, as it were, a fac-simile repre-sentation to the eye of the actual pronunciation of its words, it was necessary to leave out every letter, whether a simple, or compound mark, in every syllable of the language, for which the ear does not perceive a sound, in the usual manner of pronouncing every word, as he has done in dredzh', drudzh', grudzh', dzhudzh', lodzh', trudzh', which exactly correspond to mine, given in a simpler form-drej', druj', gruj', juj', loj', truj

I here state a few circumstances connected with the publication of Mr. Sheridan's and Mr. Walker's dictionaries, and the discontinuance of the former, of which no persons, except the publishers of the latter, could be aware. Mr. Sheridan's dictionary was first published in 1780, and printed for J. Dodsley, Fall Mall, C. Dilly, in the Poultry, and J. Wilkie, St. Paul's Church-yard. Mr. Sheridan died at Margate, in the arms of his younger son, the late R. B. Sheridan, on Thursday, the 14th of August, 1788, just eight years after the publication of his dictionary, which he left in the hands of a very near relative and his publishers, who, in consequence of some misunderstanding, discontinued it.

Mr. Walker was, at that time, a practical teacher of elocution in several schools in and about London; and, being apprised of these circumstances, was encouraged by the hooksellers to take Mr. Sheridan's dictionary and form another upon the basis of it; which, for the last forty-four years, has been admitted as the standard for a correct pronunciation of the words of the English language.

17. In marking all the diphthongs commencing with the vowel characters e and i, I make use of the letter y, as sounded ê, as in onion, un'yun, righteous, ri't-yus, instead of those vowel characters.

Concluding Statements, which mark some of the most striking features that distinguish the Author's Dic-tionary from Mr. Sheridan's, Mr. Walker's, and every other that has been presented to the Public since the publication of theirs.

1. A fac-simile of a correct pronunciation of every word, and the natural division of it into syllables, by the organs of articulation, is presented to the ear, as well as to the eye; for a single letter, vowel or consonant, does not appear, in any syllable, for which the ear will not be able to perceive a sound, in a correct pronunciation of every word.

2. He has not only followed the example of Dr. Webster, in his American dictionary, in giving all the participles and participial explanations of the active transitive verbs, as distinct words, but he has added to them all the verbs and their participles, and numbers of other parts of speech, hitherto only noticed as "not in use," or "obsolete," by Johnson, Webster, &c.; thus submitting them to the judgment of our prose and poetical writers to re-introduce them into the language, as still in use in many parts of England and Scotland, and upon the principle that, as long as the works of Chaucer, Spenser, Douglas, Shakspeare, &c. exist, in which they are to be found, they cannot be considered as obsolete.

3. In the words ab'bess, sum'mer, run'ner, tel'ling, rob'ber, rob'bing, fuller, sob'bing, snap'pish, whip'ping, —in short, in every word in the English language, in the spelling of which two consonants come together, with the accent upon the first, the closeness of the pressure of the organs, as absolutely necessary to form the accent, renders it impossible to bring them back to the same contact, without an actual stop, to give them time to collapse again, in order to repeat the same sound; in all such words, therefore, the imagination and the eye of Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Walker deceived the ear, and they have in every word given the two consonants in marking the pronunciation, though only one is heard which one only is presented to the eye throughout my dictionary, upon the general principle already laid down.
To my astonishment, also, I find that, even in words containing only one accented consonant, both Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Walker double that consonant, in giving the pronunciation, as in the words particularity, particularize. particularly, which they thus mark—par-tik-ku-ler-ize, par-tik-ku-ler-le, par-tik-ku-lar-it-e; nstead of per-tik-u-lar-it-e, per-tik-u-ler-le, per-tik-u-ler-it in his key-line, as marks of diphthong sounds, he, in the language in which they occur, pronunciations grossly inconsistent with the freedom of marks them as such: thus, &&, &&, &&, tsh&&ze. articulation and the correctness of pronunciation.

4. It has been already stated, that even the smallest words of one syllable, such as, as', in', if', no', to', do', not', which, as Horne Tooke has shown, are absurdly called particles, have each an accented letter; and Mr. Sheridan, the first and the only writer that ever explained and exemplified the true nature of our accent and emphasis, has accordingly marked every word of one syllable by its distinguished accented letter. On the contrary, it is a singular fact, that Mr. Walker has not, in a single word of one syllable throughout the language, marked an accented letter. This leads me to my statement that,

5th. As in most syllables in our language ending in e, preceded by another vowel, as ate, ite, ote, ute, the first vowel is long, and the latter, or last, not sounded, according to my general rule, I omit the terminating e, and place the accentual mark after the preceding vowel, thus, bå't, hå't, då't, må't, få't, ri't, nô't, instead of bate, hate, date, mate, rate, rite, note; the accentual mark placed after the vowel, in any part of a word, preventing the syllable from being confounded with bat, hat, dat, mat, rat, rit, not, &c. Here I may observe, that all unaccented syllables are not short, for some, as in the last syllable in con'trit', des'ti-tut', are longer than the accented syllables, con' and des'.

Though Mr. Walker does not give ee and double oo marks them as such: thus, èè, ôô, tshèèr, tshôōze, though, in every syllable of the kind, no ear but his could perceive more than one è, one ò.

6. I have a ready stated that Mr. Sheridan's dictionary was first published in 1780, and that he died in 1788. His dictionary, as well as Mr. Walker's, published in 1791, exactly three years after, exhibits to the eye thousands of errors and corruptions in the pronunciation and division of words into syllables; and both present, perhaps, a million of letters, for which the ear does not hear a single sound. But, I challenge any critic to point out a single error, in his development of the exact number, nature, and properties of the simple and compound elementary sounds of the English language, as exemplified in his "Art of Reading Prose," and in the rules which precede his dictionary. Further, as I am indebted to his very early instructions for every jot of accuracy upon this subject, every source of information, every thing but the adventitions possession of a good ear, I should consider it a duty which I owe to his memory—to the memory of a good man, and an evangelical Christian, in practice as well as belicf—to call my dictionary "Sheridan's Corrected," were I not aware that my doing so would not remove the impression which, for forty-four years, has rested almost universally on the public mind, that Mr. Walker's dictionary contained a pure standard of English pronunciation.

From the above specimens it must appear, 1st, that I do not present to the eye a single letter, in a single syllable, of any word, for which the ear does not perceive a sound, in the best pronunciation of that word; 2d, that, where the perfect ease and freedom of articulation will allow me, I keep the primitive syllables together, and make no difficult or unnatural divisions; 3d, that I am the first person who has pointed out every diphthong in the language; 4th, that, though Mr. Sheridan gives double consonants not sounded, and even doubles single consonants, he marks the accented letter correctly; 5th, that he does not corrupt the natural pronunciations as much as Mr. Walker does; 6th, that he never absurdly marks the accent, as if it fell upon a letter not sounded at all, as the e, in caprice, abridge, &c., and never presents an impossibility to the eye, that of two consonants forming a syllable, as bl, in amiable, capable, &c.

ACCENTS, &c.

Throughout his Dictionary, Dr. Johnson invariably placed the mark of the acute accent of the Greeks over the vowel of the accented syllable, and that practice has been continued to the present day in all editions of his Dictionary, as Todd's, Chalmers's, and, I believe, in every other; a practice which, if foreigners did not very naturally trust to their ears, not their eyes, and catch up the sounds of our words, in common conversation with the natives of England, Scotland, and Ireland, would have concealed from them the correct accentual pronunciation of every word in which the accent is placed, or falls, on the consonant,.—See Mr. Sheridan's exposition of the cause of Dr. Johnson's doing so, as he has exemplified it in his "Art of Reading Prose," together with his explanation of the true nature of our accent, which cannot be given here.

It will be necessary for foreigners, particularly the French, who have not the sound of the Greek theta in their language, which is marked in the English language by t joined to h, to take notice that the aspirated sound, as in theme, theatre, path, with, &c., will be distinguished from the partly vocal, and partly aspirated sound heard in thy, then, loathe, &c., by a stroke across the top of the letters t and h, thus, th, as often as it occurs.—See Principles of Pronunciation.

MR. WALKER'S OBSERVATIONS ON THE LETTER "A."

"OF THE ALPHABETICAL PRONUNCIATION OF THE LETTER A.

So many profound and ingenious observations have been made upon this first step to literature, that volumes might be filled with the erudition that has been lavished on this letter alone. The priority of place it claims, in all alphabets, has made it so much the object of attention, that philologists suppose the foundation of learning but weakly laid, till the natural and civil history of the first letter be fully settled.

But, however deep have been their researches into the origin of this letter, we find no author in our language has hitherto attempted to settle the disputes that have arisen between the natives of England, Ireland, and Scotland, about the true sound of it, when called by its name. Instead, therefore, of tracing this character through the circles of Gomer, the Egyptian hieroglyphics, the mysterious Abraxas, or the Irish Ogum, I shall endeavour to obviate a difficulty that frequently arises when it is pronounced in the horn-book; or, in other words, to inquire what is the true name of the first letter of the English alphabet-whether we are to

And first, it will be necessary to consider the nature of a vowel; which grammarians are generally agreed in defining to be "a simple articulate sound, formed by the impulse of the voice and the opening of the mouth in a particular manner." Now, as every vowel by itself is sounded long, as nothing but its junction with a consonant can make it otherwise, it is natural, when pronouncing this vowel alone, to give it the long open sound; but as this long open sound is threefold, as heard in face, father, and water, a question arises, which of these long sounds shall we adopt as a common name to the whole species of this letter? The English make choice of the a in face, the Irish of that in father, and the Scotch of that in water. Each party produces words where the letter a is sounded in the manner they contend for; but when we demand why one should have the preference, the controversy is commonly at an end; any farther reasons are either too remote or too insignificant to be produced; and, indeed, if a diversity of names to vowels did not confound us in our spelling, or declaring to each other the component letters of a word, it would be entirely needless to enter into so trifling a question as the mere name of a letter; but when we find ourselves unable to convey signs to each other, on account of this diversity of names, and that words themselves are endangered by an improper utterance of their component parts, it seems highly incumbent on us to attempt an uniformity in this point, which, insignificant as it may seem, is undoubtedly the foundation of a just and regular pronunciation.

The first rule for naming a letter, when pronounced alone, seems to be this: Whatever sound we give to a letter when terminating a syllable, the same sound ought to be given to it when pronounced alone; because, in both cases, they have their primary, simple sound, un-influenced by a succeeding vowel or consonant; and, therefore, when we pronounce a letter alone, it ought to have such a sound as does not suppose the existence of any other letter. But wherever a terminates a syllable with the accent upon it, (the only state in which it can be said to be pure,) it has always the English sound of that letter. The only exceptions to this rule are, the words fa-ther, ma-ster, and wa-ter; and that these are merely exceptions appears from the uniformity with which the a is pronounced otherwise in parent, papal, taper, fatal, &c. The other vowels have their names exactly similar to the sound they have in a similar situation, as the e like that in me-grim, the i like the i in ti-tle; the o as the o in no-ble, and the u like the u in tu-tor. Thus, as it appears from the general analogy of pronunciation, that the sound of the a, which the English adopt, is the only one that does not necessarily suppose the existence of any other sound, it inevitably follows that theirs only is the proper appellation of that letter.

But, there is another analogy by which we may determine the true sound of the vowels when pronounced singly; and that is, the sound they have when preserved long and open by the final e. Thus we call the letter e long and open by the final e. by the sound it has in theme, the letter i as it sounds in time, the letter o as heard in tone, and the u as in tune; and why the letter a should not be pronounced as heard in face cannot be conceived, as each of the other vowels has, like a, a variety of other sounds, as they are united with letters which, in some measure, alter their quality.

In consequence of entertaining a different idea of the In consequence of entertaining a different idea of the a, when pronounced in the alphabet, we see the natives of Ireland very prone to a different pronunciation of the words where this letter occurs; and, indeed, it is quite consistent with their doctrine of the sound of a, that the words parent, papal, taper, and fatal should be pronounced pah-rent, pah-pal, tah-per, and fah-tal. We find the Scotch, likewise, inclinable to the same propulsed the proposed as when alone propulsed the proposed as when alone the same that the proposed is a when alone the pronounced pah-rent part of the same propulsed the proposed as when alone the proposed the pronounced pah-rent part of the part of t pronunciation of a, when in words, as when alone. Thus we hear Sawtan for Satan, saw-cred for sacred, and law-ity for laity; and this is perfectly consistent with the manner in which they pronounce the letter a, when alone: there is no medium. If this be not the true pronunciation of these words, the a is certainly to be sounded as the English do: for, whenever the English give the Italian sound, as it may be called, to the a, except in the words father and master, it is always in consequence of its junction with some consonaut, which determines it to that sound; as in monosyllables terminating in r, as bar, car, far; but where it is not affected by a succeeding consonant, as in the words parent, papal, natal, fatal, we then hear it pronounced as the slender English a, both in and out of composition. It will, perhaps, be objected, that the most frequent short sound of a, as heard in cat, rat, mat, carry, marry, parry, is the short sound of the Italian a in father car, mar. par, and not the short sound of the a in care, mare, pare; but it may be answered, that this want of correspondence between the name of the letter, and the most frequent short sound, is common to the rest of the vowels: for the o, as heard in cot, not, rot, is not the short sound of the o in coat, note, wrote, but of the a in water, or of the diphthongs in caught, naught, and wrought; and if we ought to call the a, ah, because its short sound corresponds to ah, for the very same reason we ought to call the o, au; and a similar alteration must take place with the rest of the vowels. As therefore, from the variety of sounds the vowels have, it is impossible to avoid the inconvenience of sometimes sounding the letter one way in a syllable, and another way in a word, we must either adopt the simple long sound when we would pronounce the letter alone, or invent new names for every different sound in a different word, in order to obviate the difficulty.

It must not be dissembled, however, that the sound of a, when terminating a syllable not under the accent, seems more inclined to the Irish than the English a, and that the ear is less disgusted with the sound of Ahmer-i-cah than of A-mer-i-cay: but to this it may be answered, that letters not under the accent, in a thousand instances, deviate from their true sound; that the vowel a, like several other vowels in a final syllable not accented, has an obscure sound, bordering on u; but if the a, in this situation, were pronounced ever so distinctly, and that this pronunciation were clearly the a in father, it would be nothing to the purpose: when the a is pronounced alone, it may be said not only to be a letter, but a distinct character, and a noun substantive; and, as such, has the same force as the letters in an accented syllable. The letter a, therefore, as the first character in the alphabet, may always be said to have the accent, and ought to have the same long, open sound, as is given to that letter when accented in a syllable, and not influenced in its sound by any preceding or succeeding consonant.

"We may therefore conclude that if all vowels, when pronounced alone, are accented and long, if spelling be the pronunciation of letters elone, (as it would be absurd to suppose ourselves acquainted with the different consonants that determine the sound of the vowels before they are pronounced,) it follows, that in toelling, or repeating the component parts of a word, we ought to give those parts their simple and uncombined sound: but there is no uncombined sound of the vowel a, except the slender sound contended for, unless in the words father and master; and, therefore, when we repeat letters singly, in order to declare the sound of a word, we must undoubtedly give the first letter of the alphabet the sound we ever give it in the first syllable of the numerous class la-dy, pa-gan, ma-son, ba-sin, &c.

"Thus, after placing every objection in its strongest light, and deducing our arguments from the simplest and clearest principles, this important question seems at last decided in favour of the English; who, independent of the arguments in their favour, may be presumed to have a natural right to determine the name of the letter in question, though it has been so often litigated by their formidable and learned, though junior, relations. For though, in some cases, the natives of Ircland and Scotland adhere rather more closely to analogy than the English themselves, yet in this we find the English pronunciation perfectly agreeable to rule; and that the slender pronunciation of the letter a, as they pronounce it in the alphabet, is no more than giving it that simple sound it ever has, when unconnected with vowels or consonants that alter its power."

The following are the Observations of Mr. Todd, or Mr. Chalmers, on the letter A, as taken from Todd's Johnson's Dictionary:—

"A, has, in the English language, regularly only two sounds peculiar to itself; a short and a long one; all other sounds being irregular; and those of a are various, according to its combination with other letters.

The broad sound resembling that of the German a is found in many of our monosyllables, as all, wall, malt, salt: in which a is pronounced as au in cause, or aw in law. A open, not unlike the a of the Italians, is found, Dr. Johnson says, in father, rather, and more obscurely in fancy, fast, &c. This pronunciation is indeed found in rath, but not in its derivative rather, A open, not unlike the a of the Italians, is the a of which is usually uttered as in fancy. A slender, or close, is the peculiar a of the English language, resembling the sound of the French e masculine, or diphthong ai in pais, or perhaps a middle sound between them, or between the a and the e; to this the Arabick a is said nearly to approach; as in the words place, face, waste, and all those that terminate in ation; as relation, nation, generation. A is also, in some words, transient and unobserved, as in the last syllable of carriage and marriage; in others less faintly sounded, as in those of captain and chaplain; and in some obscurely uttered, as in collar, jocular. A, an article set before nouns of the singular number; a man, a tree. Before words beginning with a vowel and h mute, it is written an; as, an ox, an egg, an honour, an habitual practice. A is sometimes a noun; as, a great A. A is placed before a participle, or participial noun; and is considered as a contraction of at; as, I am a walking. It also seems to be anciently contracted from at, when placed before local surnames; as, Thomas a Becket. In other cases, it seems to signify to; and in some cases it signifies in. A, prefixed to many or few, implies one whole number; as, Told of a many thousand warlike French.—Shaks. A has a peculiar signification, denoting the proportion of one thing to another; as, The landlord hath a hundred a year. In burlesque poetry, it lengthens out a syllable, without adding to the sense; as, line-a, rhyming to China.—Dryden. A is sometimes corruptly put for he; as, will a come? for will he come? It is also a barbarous corruption for have. A, in composition, seems to have sometimes the power of the French a in these phrases, a droit, a gauche, &c., and sometimes to be contracted from at, Dr. Johnson Yet some of these are not so contracted. They are the same as on side, on foot, on sleep. So adays was for-merly written on days; aboard, on board. There are merly written on days; aboard, on board. There are words of which the a is become so component a part as not to be displaced; as, afresh, alive, aloud, anew; but it is redundant in arise, arouse, awake. viations, stands for artium, or arts; as A.B., bachelor of arts, artium baccalaureus; A.M., master of arts, artium magister; or anno; as A.D., anno domini. with the addition of the two Latin words per se, meaning by itself, is used by our elder writers to denote a nonesuch. It may have been adopted from the custom of the child's school, in which every letter, we may presume, was taught to be expressed per se.

MY OBSERVATIONS ON THE LETTER "A," AND ALSO ON THE OBSERVATIONS OF MR. WALKER, AND THOSE CONTAINED IN TODD'S JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY, AS JUST GIVEN.

A. The first letter of the alphabet; so pronounced by the English in naming it, in the alphabet, in spelling, and, in every word of one syllable, and in every syllable of words in which it precedes the letter ê, not sounded, as in âce, bâse, câse, dâce, fâce, râce, hâste, wâste; in short, in every word and syllable of similar construction; and, in every word of more than one syllable, in which it ends the syllable, with the accent upon it, as in mātron, pātron, Sātan, Dāthan; &c., except the words fāther, pāpā, māmā, and perhaps a few others.

Mr. Walker has given the preceding note on this

Mr. Walker has given the preceding note on this letter, and its sounds; and, his reasonings, as to its being called å, in the alphabet, rest particularly on the facts, that, in va-t numbers of words, and syllables, it is pronounced as we have both stated; but, notwithstanding these facts, he has not proved how it happened, that the Saxons, or English, came to call it å, or decide that it should be so pronounced, and not å, as the Irish used to call it; and, as many of them continue to call it, not only in the alphabet, but, whenever it ends to svllahle, with the accent upon it, as in på'tron, må'tron; or, is the Scotch used to pronounce it, as in Sa'tan, sa tred, la'ity, according to Mr. Walker's instances, as here taken from his note. For the fact of its being called å, by the English, in repeating the alphabet, he is totally unable to account; and, notwithstanding his assertion that "volumes might be filled with the erudi-tion that has been lavished on this letter alone," erudition by the way, so profound, that, it has left the question in "darkness visible;" I apprehend that, the darkness will never be dispersed; for, there is no proof on which to rest anything like a conclusion; or, to show, that, our Saxon grammarians, or, changing the name, our English, after them, or, the mass of the people, adopted the name, and the general sound of it in the instances already given, from the Celtic (pronounced keltic) language of the Britons, whom they conquered, and rooted out; and still less reason is there to suppose, that they adopted the name from the language of their Norman conquerors, from any affection they had for them, or knowledge of their language, in the pronunciation of whose alphabet, the letter is pronounced à, as in our word à'll.

By the same analogy of pronunciat.on, as when the accent is on the letter å in words of one syllable, or in syllables in which å ends the syllable; and in words of more than one syllable, the letter ê, as in ê've, is always pronounced ê, as in rê're, cê're, mê're, thê'me, schê'me, adhê're, cohêre, dê'ity, bê'ing, gê'nius. In short, whenever the accent is upon the letter c, according to the Saxon, or English practice of pronouncing the syllables, and words containing the letter, it is generally sounded ê, as a, in similar situations, is sounded â; and, from whatever cause it originated, that, our ancestors came to pronounce them so, in the situations which have been mentioned, instead of pronouncing the one å, as an fåther, or å, as in åll, and the other ê as in êve, and not å as in there, pronounced thâre; there can be little doubt, that, the general recurrence of the sounds å, in åce, and è, in eve, was the reason, why, in naming them in the alphabet, and, in relling, they pronounced them å and ê. It is a trifle; but, a trifle necessary to notice, that, in the words which Mr. Walker gives, as proofs of his observations on the different sounds å, å, å, which A represents, he unwittingly furnishes two striking proofs of the inaccuracy of his ear, both as to the sound of letters, and the division of words into syllables; for, look at his proof of the Irish manner of pronouncing a, and, it will be perceived that he marks it by adding the mark of aspiration to the vowel a, thus, ah, as if he could not have represented it, as a vowel, by the å alone with his figure of 2 over it, to denote its sound as in far, in his key line; for, the fact is, that the Irish do not add an aspiration to the vowel in pronouncing the words, parent, papal, taper, fatal, as he has marked them thus, pah-rent, pah-pal, tah-per, fah-tal; and again in Ah-mer-i-cah; and though the fact must be admitted, that, the mass of the poorer orders of Irishmen, pronounce parent, fatal, papal, with the sound of å in årt, I do not think that, any person has ever heard the most ignorant of them pronounce the word taper as either the per, or the per. The cause perhaps is, that, having little use for tapers, the word has not yet been introduced among them, the light of a turf fire, or of a rush dipped in grease, generally serving them instead of the luxury of candles, or tapers. The word master, which he gives as an exception to the rule, that the sound of a is heard, except in two or three instances, when it ends a syllable with the accent upon it, he divides thus, ma-ster. Now I would appeal to the ear, even of a child, to say, whether the word master properly pronounced, is, or is not, thus divided ma's-ter, even by the most negligent speakers, whether English, Irish, or Scotch; and I can, from the most accurate observation, say that, however vulgarly, or, disagreeably, in point of intonation, and accent, some of the Irish, or Scotch, may pronounce their words, they less change or omit the sounds of the vowels (I speak of well-educated ladies and gentlemen), und pronounce their words more distinctly, without adding, or leaving out, or changing, the sounds of consonants, than numbers of the provincial English; and those who may be properly called cockneys in London. I here leave Mr. Walker, and his note, to the judgment of the reader; and proceed to make an observation, or two, upon what I find in Mr. Todd's Johnson's Dictionary, on the sounds of the letter A; to which I refer the reader.

The dictionary says, "A, has, in the English landous properties of the control o guage, regularly only two sounds, peculiar to itself; a short, and a long one; all other sounds being irregular; and those are various, according to its combination with The broad sound resembling that of the German a, is found in many of our monosyllables, as all, wall, malt, salt, in which a is pronounced as au in cause, or aw in law. A open, not unlike the a of the Italians, is found, Dr. Johnson says, in father, rather, and more obscurely in fancy, fast, &c. This pronunciation is indeed found in rath, but not in its derivative This pronunrather, the a of which is usually uttered as in fancy." To this representation of the sounds of the letter a, so far, my observations are, 1st, that Mr. Todd leaves his reader to guess that, the "regular two sounds" are, a, in a'rt, and a in at', the only difference between which is, that the accent on the å in å'rt marks the quantity of the sound as long; whereas, being on the consonant in at', it marks it as short; the act of carrying the impetus of the voice to the consonant, reducing the vowel to a short quantity.

Proceeding in his observation on the sounds of the letters, he quotes the opinion of Dr. Johnson, instead of pointing them out himself; and exemplifying them by the accuracy of his own ear. Now the sound å, is found both in father, and rather, if the accent be laid on the a, sounded a, and not a, as some persons sound it, rå'ther; and, if the word be divided as råth'er, laying the accent on the consonant th', the sound is still the same, only reduced to a short quantity. The sound is also long, in få'st, but short in fån'cy; and, unless the difference in quantity constitutes obscurity, there is no more obscurity in the å in fån'cy, than in få'ther; and, there cannot be any in få'st, simply, because, the vowel is as long, and as full, in this word, as in få'ther; and the same difference of quantity is observable in rath, and rath'er, and fan'cy, the sound being the same, but, the difference in the pronunciation lying in the quantity; so that, Mr. Todd's implied refutation of the correctness of Dr. Johnson's examples, of the sound of å, in the four words, få'ther, råth'er, fån'cy, få'st, is not correct; and, only proves that, his ear was not correct, any more than Dr. Johnson's; nor more capable of finding out what it was that constituted, what they term obscurity, in the very same characteristic sound in different words. Of this he gives demonstrative proofs in saying, "A, is also, in some words transient, and unobserved, as in the last syllables of carriage, and marriage;" (he should have said the last syllable, for, he refers to the last syllable in each; and not to any other) "in others, less faintly sounded, as in those of captain and cheplain, and, in some obscurely uttered, as in collar, jocular." To this, the counter observations are, the a in age, the last syllable in both words, may have been transient to, the writer's eye, but, could not have been unobserved by it, if he looked at the words; but, with respect to the sound of the letter, that could neither be transient, nor unobserved, for this plain reason, that, the ear perceives no such sound in the usual pronunciation of the words, which I here exhibit, referring to both eye, and ear, according to the usual division of them into syllables, car'riage, mar'riage, or, as I might divide them nearer to the pronunciation, carriage, marriage; or, still more exactly, and in fact correctly, according to my method, throughout the following dictionary, that, of not exhibiting any letter to the eye, for which the sound is not heard in the actual pronunciation of every syllable, and word; kar'ij, mar' ij; the demonstrative fact being, that, m, a, r, with the accent on the r', are the only sounds heard in the first syllable; i, j, the only sounds heard in the latter, mar-ij; the same in the pronunciation of carriage, kår-'ij, k, å, r i, j, the three simple sounds heard in the first syllable; the short sound i, represented by i, and the compound sound dzi, represented by i, the only sounds heard in the latter syllable; as also in the latter syllable of the former—"less faintly sounded, (says he,) as in captain, chap-lain—obscurely uttered in some, as in collar, jocular."

Here is a discovery indeed! nay, here are two discoveries; the one, of a less faintly sounded in the words captain and chaplain, than in marriage and carriage; and the other, of the same sound a, obscurely uttered, as in collar, and cellar. Obscurely and faintly enough in all reason may the sound be said to strike upon the imagination, not the ear, in the pronunciation of the four words, for, though the latter syllable in captain, chaplain, collar, and the last in jocular, contains the letter å, it contains it, as a sleeping partner, in the form of the whole word. It does not contain the sound a, or å for which it may have been intended to stand in the pronunciation of the syllables; but, in place of either å, or å, the short sound almost always represented by i, is substituted in its place, in the actual pronunciation of captain, and chaplain, which is this, tshap-lin, kap-tin; and in cellar, jocular, the short sound represented by e is substituted, the syllable being pronounced er, kol-er, sel-er, only one l, also, being sounded in each. deed the syllables be pedantically divided, and pro-nounced thus, tshap-la'n, kap-ta'n, kol'lar', sel'lar', then indeed the sound a would be heard, in the former two words, instead of the sound å, which is never heard in the pronunciation of the most pedantic stickler for sounding every letter that appears in a word; and, the sound a, would be heard in pronouncing sel-lar, kol-lar; but, this constrained pronunciation is not the accustomed one, either in familiar discourse, or, in public speaking; and, the man who would attempt to introduce it would be justly ridiculed as an unpleasant speaker, and a pedant.

The author of "Virginius, whose imagination was corrected by sound judgment, with equal beauty, and accuracy of thought, makes Virginius, in his delirium, in calling for his daugnter, whom he had killed, to save her from falling into the hands of Appius Claudius, recollect the softness, and sweetness, of her voice, and, imagining he hears the sound of her voice, say,

"Is it a voice, or nothing answers me? I hear a sound so fine-there's nothing lives 'Twixt it and silence. Such a slender one I've heard, when I have talk'd with her in fancy! A phantom sound!"

Now Virginius's reasoning in his delirium of mind is perfectly natural and consistent with the unbidden train of ideas, which madmen, or persons, whose imaginations are disordered, in fever, or sleep, spontaneously pour forth from some master thoughts which suddenly rise up and dart across the mind; as every body knows who has taken a particular interest, in such a person; and the truth, delicacy, and beauty of the recollection, rest upon the expression-

"I hear a sound so fine—there's nothing lives
"Twixt it and silence"— which sound may actually exist, as proceeding from the rustling of trees, or the water of a rivulet at a distance; and not merely as, "A phantom sound," as Virginius's imagination unconsciously speaks of it. But, here is a gentleman, for I know not whether, in the dictionary which lies before me, I am speaking of Mr. Todd, or Mr. Chalmers, in full possession of his reasoning faculties, and the sense of hearing, and who, having just set his foot upon the first step of the temple of literary knowledge, undertakes, by the sense of seeing, to prove to those who are about to enter it with him, that certain words, which are inscribed on its portal, contain, in their last syllable, a certain vowel character, which usually represents three different sounds; and that, one of those sounds, which he names, is heard in the pronunciation of those syllables; when, in fact, that sound is not heard in the usual pronunciation of any one of them. A, or an, is used, and so pronounced as the singular article, and placed before nouns signifying only one of a kind, or sort; or, a whole class, or species of persons, places, or things; and when it precedes a noun singly, or, as words are arranged in sentences, it is governed, in its use, both in speech and writing, by the first sound that is heard in the word that follows it; and is pronounced and written simply a, or has the letter n added to it, as a man, a horse, an hostler, an egg, an ear, an eye, an hour, an honest man, a woman, a year, a history, an honourable woman; an amiable woman; a captain;

a year, an abundant year, a very prosperous year.

From these examples it will appear that, in point of sound, both in speaking, and writing, it is governed by the sound of the first letter that appears, or rather sound that is heard, in the word which immediately follows it in a phrase, or sentence; that is, if the sound be a vowel, except the vowels y, w, and the full diphthong sound of u, it is pronounced and written an; so that, when any word intervenes between it and the noun with which it is grammatically connected, it is invariably governed by the first sound in that word. If the word begin with a vowel sound, except y and w, it is written an. If it begin with a consonant, it is written If it begin with h, not sounded, it is written an. If it begin with h sounded, it is written a, unless the accent be on the second syllable.

Examples: an awl; an arm; an ace; an ear; an ore; an ankle; an egg; an eye; an inkhorn, an uncle. A boy; a day; a fire; a girl; a kite; a lute; a man; a nail; a pear; a queen; a rose; a slave; a task; a view; a wave; a year; a zone. A sharp awl; a strong arm; a lucky ace; a nice ear; a rich ore; a small ankle; a fresh egg; a glass inkstand; a kind uncle. An idle boy; an inclement day; an alarming fire; an industrious girl; an ugly kite; an agreeable lute; an unostentatious man; an iron nail; an early pear; an amiable queen; an odoriferous rose; an incarcerated slave; an unconscionable task; an agreeable view; an overwhelming wave; an unfortunate year; an unhealthy zone. A horse; a huntsman; a history. Finally; if the h be sounded, and the accent is on the second syllable, the article an should be used, as an historian, an historical writer. Before words beginning with the diphthong sound of i, ou, oi, oy, it is written and pronounced an; as, an ice-house; an ounce; an oil-bottle; an oyster. Before the diphthongs beginning with w, that is, & as in do, it is written and pronounced a; as, a watch; a wasp; a wan cheek; a wave; a week; a wove handkerchief; a diseased womb; a wet day; a witty saying. Before the diphthongs beginning with y, that is, e; it is also written and pronounced a; as, a year; a yawl; a yard; a yare feat; a yoke; a young lady; a youth.

It may be asked, why do not the words which begin with y and w, and the full sound of u, admit the article an, to be used before them, as well as before words commencing with the sounds of any of the other vowels, or, rather, the marks for vowels? To this the answer is, because, these sounds é, and å, ŷ, ŵ, unite with the vowels which follow them, and form part of a diphthong sound, in every word or syllable which they commence; and there would be some difficulty in first moving the organs of speech, from the contact of the flattened part of the end of the tongue, to the termination of the palate, above the upper gums, in sounding n, and then bringing them to the positions, and movements neces-sary to produce the united vowels in such words, as every person will perceive, who will take the trouble to say an word, an year, an useful thirg, the letter u in the word useful representing a diphthong composed of the sounds & and & & & & . For a contrary reason the diphthongs beginning with & in All, as & & , the sounds which produce i, and & & , and & & , as in ounce, o' & l, o'?, i'ce, do not admit the article a, to be sounded before them, but the article an; because, the action of the voice, and its movement in sounding he and ho, passes with perfect ease from the hollow of the mouth where it commences, to the front of it, where it terminates; and follows the sound of n, so smoothly, that the arti-cle an, and whatever word, or syllable possesses those diphthongs, commencing with a, and ending with c, or o, act with a perfect euphony; as, an ounce, an owl, an ice, an idle boy, an oil-skin cap, an oyster.

By mistake, I suppose, Chalmers's abridged edition o

Todd's Johnson, gives the word habitual in the phrase "an habitual practice," as an example in which an is placed before a silent h. Now, every person must per-ceive that, in general, the h is sounded, in the word habitual, the proper pronunciation of which is hå-bit'u-āl; and I say that it is an easier articulation to say, an ha-

either 8 or 8. The nearest approach that can be made to its sound is, to push the lips out to a point, and sound ao, and running the a rapidly into o. after all, as we have no such sound, and I cannot speak by letters, the best way of all, as Yorick would say, will be, for an Englishman, Scotsman, or Irishman, to get the assistance of a Frenchman, or rather, a French lady, to assist him to master the sound; for, he must have a very obtuse ear indeed that a French lady's tongue would not penetrate. Once for all, I have to observe, that, to a number of French words, and very sweet and expressive ones, that we have introduced into our language, I have endeavoured, as nearly as I can, to attach the French pronunciation.

E.

E has two sounds; long, as scene, and short, as men. E is the most frequent vowel in the English language; for it not only is used like the rest, but has the peculiar quality of lengthening the foregoing vowel: as can, cane; man, mane.—Johnson. When it ends a word, or syllable, it is never sounded, unless it be accented, or form a syllable with a consonant preceding it in the same syllable; therefore, not being sounded in such syllables as cane, mane, it may be said that it shows, not makes, the preceding to be long .- J.
